specific statutory requirements, a railroad discharges its full duties to its employees in adopting and using standard railroad methods or systems.[60] Violation of a known railroad custom has been said to constitute negligence,[61] although it has also been declared not strictly accurate to say that every violation of a custom having the force of a rule is negligence, such violations not necessarily constituting negligence as a matter of law.[62]

The failure of a railroad engineer to respond to an unauthorized[63] or unexpected[64] flag stop signal does not in itself constitute negligence, but the company will be responsible for the disregard of such a signal when the presence of a flagman at a particular point should have been anticipated;[65] likewise, an engineer's failure to obey, as required by the company's rules and common prudence, a brakeman's signal to stop the train constitutes negligence rendering the company liable.[66]

The mere use of a single track or of tracks interchangeably for trains going in either direction does not constitute negligence,[67] although it imposes on the railroad company the necessity of taking greater precautions in respect of their employees.[68] The company will be liable for injuries resulting from its failure to notify an employee of a change in the direction of traffic on a particular track;[69] but the latter principle has been held not applicable to a crossing flagman to whom a suitable signal of an approaching train has been given,[70] or to an experienced trackman who knew that the blockage of the regular track would probably require the use of another.[71] The company may likewise be liable for injuries resulting from its failure to notify employees of its intention to run a train past the point where a work train, with its crew, was located.[72] An accident is not actionable simply because a train is run as a double-header, and the reason why it is so run is immaterial in an action by an employee for injuries.[73]

In the absence of special circumstances, those in charge of trains have been held to owe no duty to fellow employees working on or near tracks to protect them from injury.[74] Under other authority, a railroad's responsibility for an accident to an employee on its track depends, not on whether the engineer did all that might possibly have been done to avoid the accident, but on whether he used the appliances at his command with the promptness expected of a prudent and skillful man in his situation.[75]

The failure of a helper on the footboard of a switch engine to see an employee in front of the engine in time to avoid a collision has been held not negligence;[76] nor can negligence be predicated on his choice of a wrong means to avoid injury in an emergency.[77]

Speed. In the absence of statutory regulations or special circumstances imposing a duty as to the speed of a train at the time and place of an accident, a railroad may run a train at any speed it sees fit,[78] although a high rate of speed may become negligence in particular circumstances,[79] as where the track is in a defective or weakened condition,[80] or where excessive speed is used in switching operations.[81]

is negligence under the Federal Employees' Liability Act.[82]

b. Duty to Employees Riding, or Seeking to Ride, on Trains or Cars

A railroad must employ methods which will safeguard employees riding, or seeking to ride, on its trains. This rule applies to employees boarding, or alighting from, trains, and with respect to unusually violent jerks or bumps.

A railroad sending out a train is bound to adopt and employ methods which will properly safeguard the persons and lives of its trainmen and other employees properly on its trains.[83] Where an employee riding on a work train has left it to carry out an order, it is the duty of the company to allow him sufficient time to perform the service and return to a safe place on the train.[84] The fact that a forbidden practice, by those immediately in charge of a locomotive, of allowing employees to ride in a position of danger thereon, has been continued for some time has been held not to render the railroad liable for injury.[85]

Boarding or alighting from train. When trainmen in charge of a freight train know it to be the duty of an employee to board the train while in motion, they must run it at a speed which will enable him to board it with reasonable safety;[86] likewise, when those in charge knew that an employee must get off at a particular station, they are under the duty, in the exercise of due care, to stop or slow down so that he may alight in safety;[87] and it has been held negligence to order a group of employees to get on a moving engine on a dark and rainy night,[88] although there is other authority to the contrary.[89] An engineer, however, is not required to slow up or stop a train for the convenience of employees seeking to ride without right,[90] or to board it in violation of rule;[91] and it has been held that failure to stop a work train, as was customary, to permit laborers to alight at their boarding place, is not negligence per se.[92] An employee negligently injured while alighting from a car used to take him to work may recover from the railroad.[93] A conductor ordering a brakeman to alight at a point which, unknown to either, is dangerous is under no duty to ascertain whether the brakeman can alight safely, or to warn of the danger, being in no superior position to gain knowledge of the danger.[94]

Jerks and bumps; unexpected stops. While no negligence on the part of a railroad can be predicated on the usual and ordinary jerks and bumps incident to the operation of a train,[95] if injuries to a trainman are the result of an unusual and unnecessary jerk or bump so violent as to show want of ordinary care, a recovery may be had,[96] unless the impact is the result of his own failure to signal in accordance with his duty.[97] So, also, the sudden stopping of a train with an unusual jar or bump, in the absence of ordinary care, may be negligence entitling the servant injured thereby to recover,[98] and, if there is a uniform course of practice by which brakemen are given warning of the stopping of a train at unexpected places, it is the duty of the company to have such warnings given.[99]

c. Collisions

A railroad owes its servants the duty to use reasonable care to regulate the running of its cars and the disposition of its rolling stock so as to avoid collisions.

A railroad company owes to its servants the duty to use reasonable care so to regulate the time and manner of running its cars and the disposition of its rolling stock along its tracks that collisions may be avoided.[1] As to collisions at crossings, the measure of this duty is the maintenance of a warning device and statutory signals reasonably tending to prevent collisions,[2] and the failure to keep a lookout to avoid a collision at a crossing has been held not excused by reliance on a watchman employed by another company.[3] The failure of a railroad company to discharge the duty which it owes to a third person to prevent a collision has been held not to render the company liable to an employee.[4]

The failure of employees of a preceding train to flag one following when forced to stop does not absolve the engineman of the latter train from the duty to maintain a reasonable lookout for the presence of the former on the track,[5] although it will preclude such employees from recovery;[6] but, when a following train is duly warned of the stopping of a preceding train by the giving of proper signals, the duty of the company toward the employees on the former train is fully performed,[7] even though such

What constitutes unexpected jerk

In determining whether unexpected jerk is negligence, unexpected is measured in light of what was normal performance of duty involved, and jerk is unexpected when it was was not reasonably to be expected as part of normal performance of duty.—Ayres v. Union Pac. R. Co., Utah, 176 P.2d 161.

Position of person in danger

(1) In order to justify employee's recovery for fall resulting from jerk of train, jerk must have been dangerous to one in such reasonably safe position as was available.—Southern Ry. Co. v. Smith, 128 So. 228, 221 Ala. 273.

(2) Sudden movement of engine was not breach of duty to fireman, unless engineer knew, or should have known, that fireman was in position of danger.—New Orleans & N. E. R. Co. v. James, 128 So. 766, 157 Miss. 607.

(3) Where a railroad detective was injured while concealed between two standing cars, because of the fact that the switch crew, who had no reason to anticipate his presence and therefore owed him no duty, allowed a third car to bump into the other two, the crew were not chargeable with actionable negligence, however hard the bump.—Cincinnati, N. Flagman not under duty to warn

Where duties of flagman in tower at crossing did not involve giving of signals with respect to trains or motor cars on same railway, but were to indicate by signals on which of two railway lines approaching trains had the right of way, negligence of railroad could not be predicated on his failure to give warning to train crew of lineman's presence upon the track in a speeder.—Cunningham v. signals were not observed.[8] Where a railroad has established an efficient block system giving such warning, it is not negligence for a railroad company to fail to give warning through its train dispatcher that a train ahead was stalled.[9]

An employee on a locomotive not having the right of way is not in the position of a trespasser as to whom the engineer of an oncoming train has no duty to exercise care to avoid injury by collision.[10] The agents and servants in charge of a train owe no duty to the operator or a passenger of a railway motor or handcar to give warning of the approach of the train;[11] but an engineer who sees such an operator ahead on the track, oblivious of the train's approach, and does not stop the train or slacken its speed, is negligent.[12] The driver of a railway motor car is guilty of no breach of duty toward a fellow employee in failing to stop, although seeing an approaching automobile, unless he perceived that the automobile driver would not stop and thereafter failed to exercise reasonable care.[13]

§ 262. Precautions against Injury; Warnings and Signals

a. In general

b. Unusual dangers

a. In General

A master must take reasonable precautions to protect his servants from injury, and must give such reasonable signals and warnings to a servant in a dangerous position as a reasonably prudent man would deem necessary.

A master must take such reasonable precautions as the circumstances demand to protect his servants from injury.[14] He must be careful to avoid emergencies likely to expose the servant to danger,[15] and may not carelessly create a situation of emergency, even though the terms of service may call for the servant to act therein.[16]

The master will be held liable for injuries resulting from his failure to give such reasonable signals and warnings to, or to keep such a lookout for, a servant in a dangerous position as a reasonably prudent man would deem necessary,[17] even Warning by fellow servant see infra § 333.

Safe employment Requirement that employer provide "safe employment" has been construed to require more than place of

though the work is simple.[18] However it is not necessary to warn an employee where a danger is obvious or normally incidental to the work on which a servant may be engaged,[19] and, where no system of warning had been instituted, the absence of one under such circumstances is not evidence of negligence on the part of the employer.[20] There is no negligence in failing to warn, or keep a lookout for, an employee who has unnecessarily and without authority assumed a position of danger which could not reasonably have been anticipated.[21]

Customary warnings and signals. A servant has the right to rely on the warnings and signals customarily given in the conduct of the business, and, if the master fails to give these, he is negligent.[22]

b. Unusual Dangers

Where the work is unusually dangerous or complex, a master should take appropriate precautions to protect his servants.

Where the work is accompanied by unusual dangers known to the employer,[23] or is of a complex nature,[24] or where an employer adopts a method of doing his work which involves risks and danger greater than the nature of the work calls for,[25] he should take correspondingly appropriate precautions, and adopt approved methods, to guard against the increased danger and risk to his employees, where such methods are practicable and are customarily used by employers similarly situated;[26] and he has been required to use reasonable care to provide a safe method of doing unusually dangerous work.[27] Likewise, if he knows, or by the exercise of reasonable diligence could have known, that he is using dangerous instrumentalities, he is called on to use a degree of care, for the servant's protection, that is reasonably commensurate with the danger.[28]

§ 263. —— Operation of Railroads

a. In general
b. Duty to trainmen
c. Duty to employees working on or about standing cars or locomotives
d. Duty to employees on or near tracks
e. Duty to employees engaged in coupling or switching cars, or employees in railroad yards

a. In General

Failure to warn a railroad employee of danger may constitute negligence under the Federal Employers' Liability Act. Such an employee has the right to rely on the warnings and signals customarily given in the conduct of the business.

Failure to warn a railroad employee of danger may constitute negligence under the Federal Employers' Liability Act.[29] It is the duty of a railroad company, in giving signals, to do so at a reasonable distance so as to afford an endangered employee opportunity to seek a safe place.[30] The rule, as considered supra § 262, that a servant has the right to rely on the warnings and signals customarily given in the conduct of the business, and, if the master fails to give these he is negligent, has been applied to the operation of railroads.[31] However, a railroad employee has a right to rely, with respect to warnings and signals, only on a breach of duty to him.[32]

Noise as warning. Where a statute or rule requires a railroad to give a warning of an approaching train by ringing a bell or blowing a whistle, it cannot escape liability to an employee by showing that the train made enough noise to have warned him of the danger, without also proving that he actually heard the noise in time to escape injury.[33]

b. Duty to Trainmen

It is ordinarily the duty of one in charge of a train to warn a fellow trainman before starting the engine; but there is no liability for failing to warn a brakeman or signalman of a train, sent forward or to the rear, of its ordinary movements.

It is the duty of one in charge of a train to give warning to a fellow trainman before starting the

Custom not contrary to reasonable care

Railroad's custom and rule requiring lookout for superior train was held not contrary to requirement of reasonable care as to flagman injured by train passing way station.—Hartung v. Union Pac. R. Co., 247 P. 1071, 35 Wyo. 188.

Failure to install an automatic block signal system prior to an accident does not imply negligence on the part of a railroad company.—Keith v. Wheeling & L. E. Ry. Co., C.C.A.Ohio, 160 F.2d 654.

Continuous train movement

In action for death of brakeman on a train moving up-grade where driving wheels of locomotive were constantly slipping and repeated sanding was necessary, to claim that each momentary pause of the train when the wheels slipped terminated a movement, and that a bell should have been rung, and a whistle blown, each time they took hold again was without merit, since there was only one continuous train movement and a proper warning was given at its inception.—Eckenrode v. Pennsylvania R. Co., D.C.Pa., 71 F.Supp. 764.

Marking car to show defective brake

A railroad owes a switchman no duty to mark a car so as to show the presence of a defective handbrake.—Summers v. Louisville & N. R. Co., D.C.Ky., 4 F.Supp. 410.

Employee as trespasser

Employee who climbed standing freight train on way to work was held trespasser whom railroad owed no duty of warning of train movements.—Macchia v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 162 A. 654, 109 N.J.Law 404.

Absence of light to show derailer

In determining railroad's liability for death of brakeman crushed under the wheels when empty car on which he was standing in order to signal switching operations at night struck a derailer, causing car to derail, fact that there was no light on small target indicating the position of the derailer would not alone be evidence of negligence in absence of showing that placing light on such target was in accord with general and approved usage.—Brady v. Southern Ry. Co., 23 S.E.2d 334, 222 N.C. 367, certiorari denied 63 S.Ct. 995, 318 U.S. 792, 87 L.Ed. 1158, affirmed 64 S.Ct. 232, 320 U.S. 476, 88 L.Ed. 239.

Signals intended for others

Question whether station and crossing signals were blown was held not determinative of defendant's negligence, injuring employee on track; such signals not being for his protection.—Norfolk & W. Ry. Co. v. Kratzer, C.C.A.Ohio, 37 F.2d 522.

engine,[34] but warning is not required where there is a custom to the contrary and the presence of such an employee in a place of danger was not to have been anticipated,[35] nor is the company liable for injuries resulting from the ordinary movements of a train without warning to brakemen or signalmen of that train who have been sent forward or to the rear and who, it is assumed, are alert and watchful.[36] An engineer whose train is on schedule ordinarily owes no duty to give warning to trainmen in general of the starting or approach of his train.[37] It has been held the common-law duty of a railroad to give warning to a brakeman of a low bridge which the train is approaching.[38]

c. Duty to Employees Working on or about Standing Cars or Locomotives

A railroad company ordinarily has the duty to give reasonable warnings and signals of the movements of trains, cars, or locomotives likely to endanger employees working in or about standing cars or locomotives.

It is the duty of a railroad company to give reasonable warnings and signals of the movements of trains, cars, or locomotives, which are likely to endanger employees working on or about standing cars or locomotives, and to keep a lookout before moving trains or cars in such circumstances,[39] and, where it is the rule or custom of a railroad to give warnings of such movements, the failure of those in charge to give the customary warning will constitute negligence;[40] likewise, where it is the custom not to move cars without a signal from an employee known to be working in a place where he cannot be seen, moving cars without such signal constitutes negligence.[41] On the other hand, the company will not be liable for a failure to warn when those in charge of such movements had no reason to anticipate the presence of such employees

Employee observed by foreman
In action against railroad for injuries sustained by employee while he was on top of stationary refrigerator car, examining vents, where foreman, who was switching cars, observed employee, but nevertheless ordered the cars to be cut, and violent jolt threw employee to ground, foreman's act of moving cars without warning employee constituted negligence.—Kansas City Southern Ry. Co. v. Larsen, 114 S.W.2d 1081, 195 Ark. 808, certiorari denied 59 S.Ct. 82, 305 U.S. 621, 83 L.Ed. 397.

Failure to flag passing train
Where work train conductor instructed flagman to flag all trains while crew was loading coal on adjoining tracks, but after setting torpedoes flagman failed to flag train, which proceeded to pass work train without warning and struck conductor as he stepped off work train onto adjoining track, railroad company was guilty of negligence.—Mumma v. Reading Co., C.C.A.Pa., 146 F.2d 215.

Statement as to time of return of engine
Foreman's direction to member of work train crew to fasten ditcher on car for trip and statement that engine would be back in ten minutes imposed no duty on railroad to signal return of engine.—McClellan v. Pennsylvania R. Co., C.C.A.N.Y., 62 F.2d 61.

Licensee
Terminal railroad association's crew for removal of passenger train to storage yards pursuant to custom known to icer, waiting in mail car for another train, owed no special duty to warn him that train was about to be moved, he being mere licensee, waiting in mail car for his own comfort and without duties therein.—Allen v. Negligent employee not foreman Fact that employee, who was alleged to have been keeping lookout while car inspector went between cars was not a foreman and did not give directions to inspector, would not absolve railroad from liability under Federal Employers' Liability Act for injuries sustained by reason of employee's failure to keep lookout, since employee was railroad's agent and was negligent.—Perry v. Missouri-Kansas-Texas R. Co., 104 S.W.2d 332, 340 Mo. 1052.

in a place of danger;[42] and the mere butting against a car in the ordinary method of making couplings without warning will not warrant recovery for injuries sustained by an employee working on such a car,[43] unless done with such force that injury might have been foreseen.[44]

Where those engaged in work about cars are entitled to notice of their movement, the duty to give such notice is owing to them alone,[45] and failure to give it cannot be relied on as negligence by one to whom the duty is not owing.[46]

d. Duty to Employees on or near Tracks

A railroad ordinarily has no duty to keep a lookout, to give signals of approach, or reduce speed, in anticipation that employees may be found along the track, but the rule does not apply where there are special circumstances affecting the company's duty.

Although it has been held that the operatives of a train must use ordinary care to discover persons who have a right to be on the track,[47] ordinarily, in the absence of statute or ordinance,[48] and provided the business of the railroad is conducted in a reasonably safe manner,[49] a railroad company owes no duty to keep a lookout, to give signals of approach, or to reduce the speed of trains, in anticipation that sectionmen, trackwalkers, flagmen, and others employed along the line of track may be found on the track, such employees being presumed to be familiar with the character of their employment and the schedules of trains.[50] This rule has been applied to crossing signals,[51] but there is also authority for the view that a railroad's duty to the public to give a suitable warning on the approach of a train or a car to a crossing applies to employees.[52]

Duty to anticipate presence

(1) A railroad company is under the humane duty to anticipate the presence of employees under or between cars, and to take such precautions for their safety as a proper lookout and timely warning of approaching cars will afford; and this duty is owing whether or not the injured employee protects himself by means of a blue flag.

In general, even though an engineer knows that trackmen, flagmen, or other employees are ahead of him, or sees them, he has a right to assume that they will leave the track in time to escape injury.[53] Where, however, the circumstances show that an employee is unconscious of his danger, it is the duty of the engineer or other employee seeing him to give warning by signal or bell,[54] regardless of whether or not a practice or custom of doing so exists,[55] but, having given such warning, he may act on the assumption that such a person will protect himself,[56] and it is not until the latter's immediate peril is apparent that it becomes the former's duty to use all means in his power to stop the train.[57]

"The very nature of the railroad business demands such a rule."—Kurn v. Weaver, 161 S.W.2d 1005, 1012, 25 Tenn.App. 556.

Basis or foundation of rule
The rule does not go on the theory that employees in charge of trains are absolved from the exercise of ordinary care, but on the idea that those employed about the tracks are aware of the constant shifting about of trains and the other exigencies incident to the normal operation of railroads, and that, this being true, the trainmen may proceed on the assumption that they will look out for themselves and not expect a warning, and hence will not be endangered by the movement of the trains without a warning.—Kurn v. Weaver, supra.

Truck in wrong place
Federal rule that railroad yard and track employees must look out for trains and that company owes them no duty to keep lookout would not apply where freight truck being pulled by tractor collided with parked freight trucks between which clerk was standing, since he was in place where tractor and trucks pulled by it should not have gone.—Mrazek v. Employee near, but not at, crossing
Where employee was rightfully on track, within several hundred feet of a crossing, and near enough to the crossing to have had the benefit of signals prescribed by statute, had they been given, the fact that he was not directly on the crossing will not preclude a recovery.—Missouri, K. & T. Warning held insufficient
The fact that engine bell was rung for considerable distance before train struck employee who was walking along track, and was observed by trainmen who realized that employee was oblivious to his peril, did not excuse railroad's failure to warn the employee by blowing whistle on the engine; nor did the whistling for public crossing at a point about a half mile west of station constitute sufficient warning, although such employee was struck at a point west of the station.—Evans v. The rule as to the nonexistence of any duty to keep a lookout or to give warnings to employees on or near tracks does not apply where a departure by the railroad from the usual custom,[58] or from its rule,[59] is shown, or where there are special or extraordinary circumstances affecting the railroad company's duty,[60] as where an employee is exposed to some unusual danger,[61] or where the presence of employees in a particular place should have been anticipated,[62] and particularly in the case of employees engaged in making repairs.[63] So, also, it is negligence to fail to give warning before starting a train standing near where construction employees are working.[64] Also, although there is authority to the contrary,[65] it has been held that warning may be required in respect to employees along the line

A lookout, to be effective, must be such as will enable a party maintaining it to discover, by the exercise of reasonable care, the presence of persons on or about the track in time to give them warning of the danger from the approaching train and to prevent injury to them by application of brakes and other means at hand.—Louisville & N. Protection only on track being repaired

Where north-bound track was being repaired, it was railroad's duty to protect trackmen by placing signal flags to warn engineers of trains approaching from either direction on such track, since trains sometimes run against traffic, but it was not required to place warning signals interfering with traffic on southbound track, which was not being repaired.—Sacco v. of track when a train is not running on schedule,[66] or even when running on schedule where the accident is the result of misinformation given the injured employee that the train was running late,[67] or when an unexpected or unannounced train movement is made.[68]

An employee who is not in discharge of a duty while proceeding along the tracks is not entitled to protection, except for the duty to avoid injuring him after his peril is discovered.[69]

e. Duty to Employees Engaged in Coupling or Switching Cars, or Employees in Railroad Yards

The authorities are not consistent as to whether a railroad has a duty to give warning of the approach of engines and cars to men employed about, and familiar with, the operation of the yards, as where they are engaged in switching movements or in coupling or uncoupling cars.

In some cases it is held that, in railroad yards, where engines and cars are constantly moving to and fro, there is ordinarily no duty on the railroad to give warning or notice of their approach to or keep a lookout for, men employed about, and familiar with the operation of, the yards,[70] or to those employees who are accustomed to cross the yard in going to and from their work,[71] at least in the absence of any knowledge or ground for belief that they are in a position of danger,[72] or unless they are actually seen to be in immediate peril and oblivious thereof;[73] and this rule is applied to all yard employees, regardless of their class and the character of their work, and of their precise and particular duties.[74] However, if the rule of a railroad company, or the custom or usage in the yards, required a warning, the failure to warn will be actionable negligence;[75] and, if the manner of use of a yard is changed, it is the duty of the company to warn

Protection for others not available to employee
Railroad employee, familiar with conditions in switching yard, cannot expect same protection, with respect to lights and lookouts, which railroad must exercise toward passengers or others who have come on premises for business, and had no right to expect there would be lights or other warning on switching cars.—Caples v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co., 283 P. 53, 129 Kan. 341.

its employees of such new use.[76] It has been held that the fact that the yards were dark and unlighted is not negligence on the part of the railroad,[77] even though it was the practice of a number of railroads to light their yards.[78]

On the other hand it has been held that while it is primarily the duty of employees in railroad yards to take precautions for their own safety in passing over or along the tracks, there is a concurrent or secondary duty, independent of statute or rule, on the part of those in charge of moving engines or cars to take such precautions, and give such warnings, as are reasonably necessary to avoid injury to an employee who may neglect to protect himself,[79] as where those in charge know or have reason to believe, that others are in positions where they will be endangered by such movements.[80] Thus, it is held that it is the duty of the railroad to see that reasonable precautions are taken and warnings given by those in charge of the movements of trains, cars, or engines to those assisting in such movements as involve switching,[81] or the coupling or uncoupling of cars,[82] where those in charge knew, or should have known, of the presence of employees engaged in coupling,[83] or to those whose duties are associated with, or dependent on, persons in charge of the movements of trains, cars, or engines;[84] but a railroad is not required to look under stationary cars in its switching yard before moving them, in order to ascertain whether someone is under a car.[85]

(1) Long experience of switchman and his familiarity with custom or rule respecting time for coupling air hose authorized coemployees to

A railroad owes a switchman the duty of seeing that the engine and cars are not moved except in compliance with his signals, in accordance with its rules.[86]

§ 264. Statutory Regulations

a. In general

b. Applicability of particular statutes to employees

a. In General

An employee may proceed against his employer for violation of a statute or ordinance governing methods of work or precautions against injury only if the duty imposed is for the employee's protection.

In order that an employee may predicate an action against his employer on the violation of a statute or ordinance governing methods of work or precautions against injury, it must appear that the duty imposed is for the protection of the employee.[87] It has, however, been held that in an action for a breach of a common-law duty owing by a master to his servant, evidence of acts amounting to negligence may be shown, although such acts may also show a violation of a statute enacted for the benefit of the public generally, and not for the class of persons to which the servant belonged,[88] and the fact that the legislature has required the sounding of a whistle or the ringing of a bell by railroad companies at certain places does not relieve such companies from giving a signal at other places where none is exacted by statute, provided reasonable care for the safety of its employees or others makes it necessary.[89]

A provision in the mining laws which requires that in shaft mines there shall be maintained the ordinary means of signaling to and from the top and bottom of the shaft imposes the duty to install and use a signaling system equal in efficiency and safety to that in general use, and the use of a system less safe is negligence per se,[90] as are the violation of an ordinance by a railroad while operating within the city limits[91] and the violation of a railroad speed ordinance[92] and of an ordinance regulating the movements of locomotives and cars.[93] The mere violation by an interstate carrier of the Hours of Service Law, at the time an employee is injured, is not sufficient of itself to justify a recovery, in the absence of some act of negligence of the carrier concurring with, or attributable to, the act contributing to the injury.[94] However, in the absence of statutory authorization, a act on theory that he would comply with such custom and rule.—Southern Ry. Co. v. Glenn, 154 So. 792, 228 Ala. 563.

(2) Decedent and fellow servants knowing of custom not to couple air for switching involved, such servants were not bound to anticipate decedent would be between or under cars coupling air before moving train, especially where that was not decedent's work.—Mobile & O. municipality cannot impose regulations on railroad companies in respect of switching cars in their private switching yards.[95]

A statute requiring a locomotive engineer to blow a whistle or ring a bell at short intervals while moving within, or passing through, a town or village does not require such signal before or when making a coupling in a railroad yard;[96] and a statute requiring railroads to give signals on approaching highway crossings has been held not to apply to crossings in cities and incorporated towns where the railroads are subject to police regulations and city ordinances regulating speed and signals.[97] A statute prohibiting railroads from making certain kinds of switches and providing for damages for injuries caused by a violation, without regard to contributory negligence of the party injured, is a legitimate exercise of the police power of the state.[98]

Violation by employee. Where a statute provides that it shall be unlawful for any person to use dynamite in a mine except under such rules and regulations as may be agreed on between the employer and the employees, an employee injured while using dynamite, without any rule having been provided, cannot recover for such injuries, notwithstanding no rules could have been entered into which would have prevented his injury if he had acted as he did;[99] but, if such rules had been made, the fact that they permitted plaintiff to do what he did would not have prevented recovery.[1]

b. Applicability of Particular Statutes to Employees

The authorities are not consistent as to whether statutes and ordinances regulating the operation of railroads in such matters as speed, signals, and lookouts may be availed of by employees, or are only for the protection of the general public.

It has been held in some cases that statutes or ordinances requiring the fencing of railroad tracks,[2] or the giving of signals at crossings, stations, or similar places by those in charge of trains,[3] or the keeping of a lookout,[4] or regulating the speed of trains,[5] are for the protection of the public in general, and that a violation thereof cannot be made the basis of an action for injuries by the employee against his employer. In other cases, it is held that the protection intended by ordinances or statutes regulating the speed of trains,[6] or requiring warning signals to be given of their approach,[7] extend to railroad employees. Furthermore, it has been held in some decisions that an employee may base an action on a violation of a statute requiring a lookout to be kept,[8] the presence of a flagman,[9] or the maintenance of a headlight at night,[10] and the latter statutory requirement has been held to apply to employees even in a state where the requirement of giving signals for crossings has been held not to apply.[11] Also it has been held that a conductor of a street railway company is within the protection of a statute making it the duty of a motorman to bring his car to a stop at a certain distance from a railroad crossing.[12]

Where, however, an employee was not using a public crossing when the injuries complained of

were sustained, it is unimportant whether or not the crossing signals required by statute were given or the train was proceeding at a speed prohibited by ordinance.[13] Likewise, a statute requiring signals on the approach of a train to a public road crossing has no bearing on an action for injuries to a brakeman by coming in contact with a highway bridge across the railroad track, and it is error to consider it;[14] nor can the violation of a statute requiring a warning signal to be given by the engineer when about to start a train be relied on by an employee riding on that train.[15]

Where the authority of a town to enact ordinances regulating the speed of trains is limited to the protection of highway crossings, a railroad employee working elsewhere than at a crossing is not within the protection of the ordinance.[16]

§ 265. Degree of Care Required

In adopting methods of work, a master is held to such reasonable care as is commensurate with the danger to be reasonably apprehended.

Such reasonable or ordinary care is required of the master in the methods of work adopted by him as is commensurate with the danger to be reasonably apprehended, and as reasonable and prudent men would exercise under similar circumstances.[17] An engineer, or others in charge of a train, has been required to exercise only reasonable care in the management or operation of the train;[18] and the degree of care to be exercised by a locomotive fireman in watching the track is the most reasonable care under the existing circumstances, taking into consideration his other duties.[19]

§ 266. Delegation of Duty

As a general rule a master cannot delegate his duty of providing reasonably safe methods of work.

In most cases it is held that a master cannot delegate to a servant or agent his duty of providing reasonably safe methods of work, so as to relieve himself of responsibility for injuries caused by the negligence of his agent in adopting improper methods,[20] while others hold that, where the master has employed a competent and experienced superintendent or foreman, and has furnished the proper and usual appliances for the performance of the work, he is not liable for injuries resulting from the method adopted by such agent for doing the work.[21] The master is justified in leaving to the judgment and discretion of the servant arrangements for carrying out mere details of the work,[22] and, although a duty to warn rests on the master, when a servant has been in fact warned it is immaterial whether the warning was given by a person in authority or by a coemployee.[23] Although a company had leased the tracks on which work is being done, it is not relieved of its duty to give warning to its servants engaged in making repairs thereon.[24]

§ 267. Customary Methods

A master who employs the usual and customary methods employed by prudent and careful men engaged in similar business is generally not liable for injuries to a servant, provided such methods do not disregard the servant's safety.

While the test of a master's liability is the exercise of reasonable and ordinary care for the safety of the servant, and not whether he has employed customary methods,[25] as a general rule a master will not be held liable for injuries to a servant in the course of his employment where the usual and customary methods of work are employed,[26] provided such methods are generally employed by prudent and careful men engaged in similar business[27] and provided they do not disregard the safety of the servant.[28] The existence of a general custom, however, is immaterial when its effect is to nullify the requirements of a statute;[29] and the general rule does not apply where the unsafeness in the method or system is so evident that impartial persons could not well be in disagreement on the issue;[30] and usage cannot make an unreasonably or unnecessarily dangerous practice reasonably safe,[31] or safe as a matter of law,[32] or the standard of care.[33]

Where a servant, knowing the hazards of his employment as the business is conducted, is injured while engaged therein, he cannot recover merely on the ground that there was a safer mode in which the business might have been conducted, the adoption of which would have prevented the injury.[34] On the other hand, a servant has the right to rely on the continued observance by the master of such methods of work and precaution as he has been accustomed to follow and observe,[35] even though they are not required by the printed rules of the master.[36] In the absence of any rule governing a particular situation, it is proper to consider the existence of an established custom with respect thereto,[37] and a method of protecting employees, established by a master, may be equivalent to a rule.[38] In order for conduct of employees to amount to a custom binding on the employer, it must amount to a regular course of practice and be known to the employer.[39]

An employer who permits a dangerous custom to exist in the operation of his business and acquiescing therein must answer in damages for all foreseeable consequences.[40] So, where a custom or practice is adopted by employees from which it is likely that injuries may result, it becomes the employer's duty to exercise reasonable precaution to prevent the continuance of such practice;[41] but, where a servant is injured by reason of a violation of his duty, the fact that he and other employees of his class had been in the habit of so violating their duty, with the knowledge of, and in pursuance of a custom known to, the agents of the master, will not give a right of action.[42]

§ 268. Knowledge of Danger

In order to hold a master liable for injuries caused by his unsafe methods of work or his failure to warn the servant, ordinarily it must be shown that he had, or ought to have had, knowledge of the danger.

Ascertaining danger in train movement

Freight engineer operating train on main line has right to rely on custom, having force of rule, that persons operating coal train from side tracks onto main line would telephone to operator at next station to find out possibility of danger in moving train onto main track.—Goodman v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., 7 N.E.2d 393, 289 Ill.App. 320, certiorari denied Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Goodman, 58 S.Ct. 610, 303 U.S. 640, 82 L.Ed. 1100.

Custom not one of trade or locality

The customary practice of mail and baggage handlers, in alighting from trucks, of using that part of truck's superframework most readily available at the time, was not such a custom or usage of a particular trade or locality as must be pleaded and proved to be certain and uniform in order to charge employer with knowledge thereof and consent thereto.—Wellinger v. Term "known," in statute relative to occupational diseases and requiring employer to post notices of known dangers to health and known means of avoiding injurious consequences of work, refers to dangers and means known at time of enactment of act and from time to time thereafter with growth of knowledge and development of industry.—Wolf v. Dangers incident to operation of machinery

where the circumstances were such as to convey to the mind of an ordinarily prudent person the fact that an employee's safety was imperiled;[45] but it has also been held that the master is bound to know whether the methods he prescribes are reasonably safe, or liability attaches.[46]

Knowledge that an employee might be in a place of danger renders the master liable for injuries to one in that place, although he had no knowledge that the particular employee was there;[47] and where a general custom has continued for a long time, without protest or objection on the part of the employer, he is charged with knowledge of the actions of employees under such custom[48] and of their presence in places in which they are accustomed to be under such practice.[49] On the other hand, the fact that an injured employee, mature and in full possession of his faculties, was familiar with all the danger involved in a particular activity must be considered;[50] and recovery against the master on the ground of negligence has been denied where the servant had knowledge, or means of knowledge, of the danger equal[51] or superior[52] to that of the master.

Sending into place of danger. There is generally a duty on the part of the master not to send the servant into a place of danger where such danger, although known to the master, is not known to the servant and is of such a character that it cannot be discovered by the exercise of ordinary care and caution on his part;[53] and the violation of such duty constitutes negligence.[54]

§ 269. Proximate Cause of Injury

In order to recover for injury on the ground of the master's unsafe method of work, the servant must show that the method was the proximate cause of the injury.

The master's method of work must be shown to have been the proximate cause of the injury to warrant a recovery by his servant on the ground of unsafe method.[55] Failure to comply with an established custom of warning employees is actionable

§ 271. —— Duty to Adopt and Promulgate

a. In general

b. Effect of custom of others

a. In General

With respect to a master's duty to adopt and promulgate rules for his employees' safety, the authorities impose a general requirement of this nature or limit the duty to businesses which are complex or dangerous.

It may be stated generally that a master must promulgate reasonable rules and regulations for the safety of his employees,[57] and that if ordinary care in the conduct of his business,[58] the nature of the work,[59] or surrounding conditions[60] require or demand that he provide such rules and regulations his duty to do so arises. More specifically, where a master is engaged in a complex or dangerous business, or where the safety and protection of employees depend on the adoption and enforcement of rules, he must adopt and promulgate such rules and regulations for the conduct of his business and the government of his servants in the discharge of their duties as will afford reasonable protection,[61] although it has also been held that the obligation arises only when, in addition to being dangerous, the work is complex and the conditions which may arise are uncertain and obscure.[62] The master is not, however, required to prescribe rules with reference to the execution of minor details which may properly be left to the discretion of the servant in charge.[63]

The duty of a master to establish rules for conduct of his work is a continuing one,[64] and where there has been a change in the manner of the operation of his business, with the knowledge or assent of the master, the duty devolves on the master to provide other rules for the protection of his servants.[65]

The mere failure to adopt rules, or any particular rule, is not proof of negligence unless it appears that the master, in the exercise of reasonable care, should have foreseen the necessity for so doing.[66] Thus it is held that no duty is imposed on the master to adopt rules where the work or business is not complex or not hazardous,[67] where simple tools and appliances are used,[68] where the dangers incident to the work are obvious[69] or of common knowledge and fully understood by the servant,[70] where the duty of the servants to avoid the danger is manifest,[71] where the practice or custom actually in force renders a rule unnecessary,[72] where the adoption of a rule is impracticable,[73] or where rules could not have prevented the injury;[74] nor is the master bound to make rules as to how his servants shall conduct themselves outside the scope

Personal supervision
If the work is dangerous and of such character and extent that the master and his foreman cannot personally supervise it, it is the master's duty to adopt and publish rules and regulations reasonably adapted to guard his servants against dangers of which he has knowledge, or of which he could have known by the exercise of due care, and of which the servant did not have knowledge and of which he could not have known by the exercise of due care.—Hendrickson v. of their employment, or as to how business shall be carried on, or any act done, which is not carried on or done with his knowledge and permission.[75]

b. Effect of Custom of Others

While the adoption or nonadoption of rules by others in the same business is not conclusive as to a master's duty in this respect, as a general rule he is relieved of liability where he follows the general practice, and his failure to prescribe rules generally provided by others is evidence of his negligence.

While the adoption or nonadoption of rules by others in the same line of business is not conclusive as to the duty of the master in this respect,[76] as a rule his adoption of such regulations as are in general use will relieve him from liability,[77] and, where there is no evidence that any rules relating to the business had been adopted by others or were necessary or practicable, he is not chargeable with negligence in failing to adopt any.[78] On the other hand, if persons of ordinary prudence, engaged in the same line of business, have found it necessary to provide rules for its management, the failure of the master to prescribe such rules is evidence of negligence,[79] but the custom of providing rules in a particular business, of which proof is offered, must be a general one,[80] and negligence cannot be imputed to a railroad company on the sole ground that it failed to adopt the same methods for operating its road that other roads had in use unless it is shown that conditions are the same[81] and that the result of experience is in favor of such methods.[82]

§ 272. —— Duty to Enforce Obedience

It is the master's duty to enforce his safety rules, or to use reasonable care to see that they are complied with, and he is responsible for injuries resulting from his failure to enforce them.

It is the duty of the master to enforce the rules adopted by him for the safety of the servants, or to use reasonable care to see that they are complied with, and if he fails to do so he will be responsible for injuries resulting from noncompliance therewith;[83] and employees have a right to rely on the reasonable enforcement of the rules.[84] This duty cannot be delegated so as to relieve the master of liability for failure therein,[85] the employer being an insurer that such duty be performed.[86] It is no

defense in an action brought for injuries resulting from noncompliance with rules that the employee causing the accident did not know the existence of such rules.[87] Evidence of a single violation of a rule is, however, not sufficient to show that the master had such knowledge that the rules were being habitually violated as to make him liable for a failure to enforce them.[88]

§ 273. —— Reasonableness and Sufficiency

A master's safety rules must be reasonable and sufficient, possible of performance, specific and definite, and must afford reasonable protection to the servant.

Under a presumption in their favor,[89] rules which a master has adopted for the government of his servants, to prevent injuries to them, must be reasonable and sufficient.[90] Thus a railroad company may establish rules of precedence among its several classes of employees and vehicles and require one class to give way to the right of another thereunder.[91] To be sufficient, rules must be specific and definite, and not too general,[92] and must afford reasonable protection to the servant.[93]

In order to require obedience, a rule must be practicable and possible of performance;[94] and where, under the guise of rules, a master seeks to evade duties imposed on him by law, the servant is not bound thereby.[95] Thus the master cannot by promulgating a rule requiring its employees to perform their work in a particular way, defeat an action for an injury caused by its failure to meet the requirements of a statute,[96] and it cannot relieve itself by a rule by which the employee assumes all the risk of his employment[97] or by a rule which amounts to a contract against negligence;[98] but a stipulation in a contract of employment that an employee would obey prescribed rules and see for himself that they were carried out is not void as against public policy where it does not exempt the employer from liability or limit its liability for the consequences of its own negligence.[99]

§ 274. —— Notice to Servant

In order to relieve a master of liability for injuries to a servant resulting from the latter's disregard of the safety rules, the servant must have had actual or constructive knowledge of the rules.

Rules as to details of work
It is not the absolute duty of the master to insure obedience to rules in respect of mere details of the work.—Arveson v. Boston Coal, Dock & Wharf Co., 150 N.W. 810, 128 Minn. 178—39 C.J. p 474 note 5.

While it has been broadly stated that an employee is held to know and observe the rules promulgated by the employer in the operation of its business,[1] ordinarily to relieve the master of liability for injuries to a servant resulting from the latter's disregard of the rules adopted by the master for the management of his business and the government of his servants, the servant must have had knowledge, actual or constructive, of the rules.[2] The duty of the master as to giving notice is ordinarily performed when he has made the rules known to his servants, which rules, if observed and followed by all concerned, will bring such personal notice to every one entitled to it.[3] The actual delivery of a copy of the rules to a servant[4] or the reading of a rule to him[5] is not necessary to charge him with knowledge. While posting in a conspicuous place ordinarily is sufficient,[6] it is not necessary as to a rule established by custom.[7] The printing of rules is not required in every case,[8] and the servant may properly be instructed orally,[9] and even knowledge of the existence and terms of rules, acquired by oral tradition, is sufficient to bind the servant.[10]

§ 275. —— Waiver and Customary Violation

Where the master's rules are habitually disobeyed with his knowledge or express consent, they are regarded as waived or abrogated, and he cannot rely on them to defeat an injured employee's action.

Where the rules and regulations established by the master are habitually disobeyed with his knowledge or express consent,[11] or have been disregarded without his express consent in such a manner, and for such a length of time, as to raise a presumption that he must, or, in the exercise of ordinary care and diligence should, have become aware of such habitual disregard,[12] or a practice has been established by the master inconsistent with such rules and regulations,[13] such rules and regulations will be regarded as waived or abrogated, and the master cannot rely on them to defeat an action by an injured employee. It has, however, been held that the general rule does not apply in the case of regulations or rules designed solely for the protection of servants and that a greater degree of proof is required to establish the abrogation of such rules.[14]

Notice to servant or agent of master. Generally the master will be charged with the knowledge of a servant or agent that a rule which it is such servant's duty to enforce is habitually violated.[15] reasonable construction,[16] there is a presumption that they have been carefully considered and accurately expressed, and they ought to be construed more strongly against the master who has made and adopted them than against the servant who has merely assented to, and agreed to be bound by, them.[17] Rules of the employer,[18] or separate and distinct clauses embodied in a single rule,[19] should be considered and construed together so as to give effect to all, if possible, and not to abrogate any.[20] Resort may be had to custom to interpret, but not to contradict, explicit rules and positive orders.[21] The understanding of employees as to the application of a rule is not controlling,[22] although it may be considered,[23] and a long and uninterrupted construction by employees at variance with the rule may modify its requirements;[24] but a rule susceptible of two constructions will not be given the construction claimed by the party asserting it, when it has never been so construed by the employer and was not relied on by such party.[25]

A rule will not be construed to require an enforcement which would make impossible the operation which the rule was intended to make safe.[26] Under a rule requiring each employee to do his work in a manner not jeopardizing fellow employees, whether a duty is imposed on a railroad employee to warn a fellow employee depends on the circumstances of each case and the situation created thereby.[27] A rule requiring train crew members to familiarize themselves with the rules governing the duties of others and to be prepared in the case of an emergency to act in any capacity to insure safety contemplates that, if an employee is incapacitated to perform his duties, the next lower employee shall take over,[28] but it does not contemplate that a subordinate employee shall by force take over the duties of a superior employee who is violating some rule.[29]

Persons to whom rules apply. Rules of an employer will be applied only against,[30] and in favor of,[31] those to whom the rules were clearly intended to apply, and will not be extended to those not intended to be covered thereby.

General and special rules. Where there is a general rule regulating the conduct of servants, which applies under ordinary conditions, and there is a special rule which applies under extraordinary conditions, the special rule supersedes the general rule when the extraordinary conditions exist, and a violation of the special rule under extraordinary conditions is not excused by an observance of the general rule.[32]

b. Operation and Effect

Disregard by an employee of reasonable rules of the employer will preclude recovery for injury unless obedience thereto would have augmented the danger or been impracticable; but the mere adoption of rules will not exempt the employer from liability for negligence.

Where a master adopts reasonable rules which are brought to the knowledge of his servant, such rules constitute an element of the contract of hiring[33] and govern the legal relation of the parties when they are observed as well as when they are

Circumstances requiring warning

In order to impose liability for violation of such rule, opportunity to give warning, necessity that it be prudent under circumstances to give it, and necessity for giving warning or some useful purpose to be served thereby, are required; liability does not arise, on the ground of such violation, where no opportunity existed for fellow employee to give warning except at expense of his own safety or where employee had full notice without being so informed by fellow employee.—Shane v. Employees as well as public intended Railroad's rule requiring foremen to give such careful attention to their men from time they enter on tracks until they leave them as is necessary to see that work is done with safety and efficiency, even if promulgated with reference to interest, welfare, and safety of public and shippers, also referred to safety of railroad's employees.—New York Cent. R. Co. v. Verpleatse, 59 N.E.2d 916, rehearing denied 60 N.E.2d 784, 116 Ind.App. 1.

Employees on engine or track

A provision in a railroad company's rules for the ringing of the bell when an engine is about to move is as much for the protection of employees on or about the engine as for persons on the track.—Montgomery v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., C.C.A. Ohio, 22 F.2d 359.

Persons on track in position of danger

Railroad company's rule, requiring railroad to give ample warning by whistle to persons on track, bridge, or trestle required warning only to persons seen or known to be on track in position of danger.—Central Vermont Ry. v. Sullivan, C.C.A.Mass., 86 F.2d 171.

Yard clerk

Railroad rule that when cars are pushed by an engine, except when shifting or making up trains in yards, a trainman must take a conspicuous position on front of leading car, applies to employees whose safety may be impaired by its nonobservance, so that yard clerk engaged in checking freight cars was within its intended protection.—McCrowell v. disregarded;[34] and disregard or disobedience thereof will preclude recovery for injury sustained[35] unless obedience thereto would have augmented the danger or been impracticable,[36] or the proper performance of his duty, on the part of the employee, necessitated such a violation,[37] or unless, as discussed infra § 277, such disobedience is not the proximate cause of the injury. However, the mere adoption of rules and regulations will not exempt the master from liability for negligence,[38] and an employee's failure to observe a rule intended for his safety does not exempt the employer from exercising due care.[39] The adoption of rules admits the reasonable necessity for the conduct thereby prescribed,[40] and specific directions made part of rules constitute standards of care, presumably demanded by the exigencies of the business, to which all persons employed in the business are required to conform.[41]

§ 277. —— Proximate Cause of Injury

In order for a servant to recover for injuries on the ground of the master's failure to adopt or enforce rules, such failure must have been the proximate cause of the injury; and an employee's disobedience of rules, to bar his recovery for injury, must have been the proximate cause thereof.

In order that the servant may recover for injuries alleged to have been caused by the failure of the master to adopt or, having adopted, to enforce, reasonable rules for the government of his servants, such failure must be shown to have been the proximate cause of the injury.[42] For disobedience of rules to bar an employee's recovery for injury, such disobedience must have been the proximate cause of the injury.[43]

§ 278. Orders

A special order has been held to prevail over a general rule; but the contrary has also been held.

Measure of requirements

In determining railroad's liability for death of employee struck by train, what an applicable rule of railroad requires may be evidence in the nature of an admission of what should be done, but what should be done is measured by what the standard of prudence requires to be done, or by what applicable authoritative enactments, legislative or otherwise, require to be done, regardless of the rule.—Smith v. sistent with a general rule has been held required to obey the order rather than the rule;[44] but special orders made necessary by an accident temporarily interrupting the regular service of a railroad should be construed merely to require the employee to adhere to them as closely as due regard for safety permits, and not to abrogate the standing rules of the company,[45] and the partial supersession of yard-limit rules by the adoption and use of certain orders inconsistent therewith does not wholly dispense with them, and they still apply in a modified form.[46] If an order has been read to an employee, he is charged with the duty of understanding it.[47]

Compliance with commands as affecting assumption of risk is discussed infra §§ 398–403, disobedience of orders as contributory negligence infra §§ 457–459, and compliance with commands or orders as affecting contributory negligence infra §§ 463–467.

§ 279. —— Authority to Give

A master is bound by orders given by an authorized agent, and is liable for injuries to a servant proximately caused by obedience to such orders.

The master is bound by orders given to a servant by an authorized agent, and will be liable to the servant for injuries received while acting in obedience thereto[48] if, as discussed infra § 283, such obedience is the proximate cause of the injury; and this is true even though the act ordered is in violation of the provisions of a statute[49] or the agent has no right to give such orders.[50] Where two agents are over one servant, he may obey the superior of the two,[51] but a master will not be bound by orders given by an unauthorized person,[52] even though the servant believed that it was his duty to obey such orders,[53] unless the master clothed the person giving the order with such apparent authority as to justify the servant in believing that he was in fact authorized.[54] The mere fact, however, that an authorized order was transmitted through a fellow servant, and not received directly from one in authority, will not relieve the master from liability.[55]

§ 280. —— Negligence in Giving Orders

A master must use reasonable care to protect his servants from danger in executing orders, and is liable for negligence in giving orders; but he cannot be held liable in the absence of negligence or where a servant goes beyond what the order can be held to have contemplated.

Since it is the duty of a servant to obey an order given by one in authority over him, if not manifestly unreasonable, the master must use reasonable care to protect his servants from danger in the execution of orders, and will be held liable for his own or his vice principal's negligence in giving orders.[56]

Reasonable grounds to expect safety
Whether boss was negligent in ordering attempt to pull log over stump, resulting in injury to member of crew, depends on whether he had reasonable grounds to believe it

In the absence of negligence the master cannot be held liable;[57] thus a general order given by the master to a servant to do work in the usual course of employment[58] or a peremptory order to a servant to do a certain thing of a simple everyday character[59] does not make the master liable for injuries received by the servant while acting under the orders or obeying the command; and this is so even though the business is dangerous, where it is the regular business of the master and the servant is not inexperienced.[60] The master, a superior servant, or vice principal may give such orders about the work as are essential to induce a prompt and attentive discharge of the duties imposed on the servant without breaching the obligation to exercise ordinary care for the safety of the servant.[61]

The master is not liable where a servant goes beyond what the order given him can be held to have contemplated.[62] It is not the employee's interpretation of the order which controls, but the reasonable and fair inference to be drawn from all the language used;[63] the obvious meaning of an order cannot be changed by the construction placed on it by one or more servants.[64]

Customary methods. The master may show, in defense to an action for personal injuries, that the course pursued by him in giving the order complained of was that followed by other well regulated companies in the same line of business[65] or that the work which the servant was ordered to do was customarily done by servants of this class and that he was willing to do the work for the extra pay.[66]

§ 281. —— Knowledge of Defect or Danger

A master is not liable for injuries received by a servant while obeying an authorized command unless the person giving it knew, or by the exercise of reasonable care should have known, of the defect or danger which resulted in the injury.

Exposure to peril beyond ordinary risks
In order to constitute negligent order, it must have been reasonably apparent to master or vice principal that execution of command would expose servant to peril beyond ordinary risks of service, against which reasonable care on servant's part would probably not protect him; if peril was obvious to servant and might readily be avoided by him while executing order, master had right to assume that servant would observe and avoid peril.—Seaboard Air Line Ry. 66. Ky.—Wadlington v. Newport News & M. V. R. Co., 20 S.W. 783, 14 Ky.L. 559.

A master is not liable for injuries to a servant received by the latter while obeying an authorized command unless the person giving the command knew, or by the exercise of reasonable care should have known, of the defect or danger which resulted in the injury.[67] It is generally not negligence for an employer to direct an employee to perform services the risks of which are apparent to, and appreciated by, the employee;[68] but a servant acting in obedience to a command, on the assurance of the one giving it that there is no danger, may rely on such assurance and the master will be liable for resulting injuries.[69] Where an employer knows, or by the exercise of reasonable care should know, that some injury will probably result to an employee doing the work negligently ordered, it is not essential to recovery to show the employer's knowledge of the precise injury resulting.[70]

§ 282. —— Duty toward Inexperienced or Youthful Servant

A master knowing that a servant is inexperienced or too young to appreciate the danger which the master knows, or ought to know, is incident to an act ordered is liable for injuries received by the servant while executing the order.

Where the master knows that a servant is inexperienced or not of an age to appreciate the danger incident to an act which he is ordered to do, the master will be held liable to the servant for injuries received by him while executing an order which the master knows, or ought to know, involves danger,[71] but it is not negligence for a master to set his servant to a piece of work where such servant is of sufficient age and intelligence to appreciate the risk, which is both patent and incident to the particular work;[72] nor will the mere fact that a servant was under age show negligence on the part of the master where the servant had worked for some time in the capacity in which he was working when injured and understood the duties and responsibilities of the position.[73]

§ 283. —— Proximate Cause of Injury

In order to recover for injuries allegedly resulting from obedience to a negligent order, a servant must show that such obedience was the proximate cause of the injury.

In an action for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from obedience to a negligent order, there can be no recovery unless it is shown that the act of the servant in obeying such order was the proximate cause of the injury.[74]

D. WARNING AND INSTRUCTING SERVANT

§ 284. Duty and Liability of Master Generally

It is the duty of the master to warn and instruct his servant as to the defects and dangers of which he knows, or ought, in the exercise of reasonable care and diligence, to know, and of which the servant has no knowledge, actual or constructive.

Agreement with third person

Master's duty to disclose to servant dangers in process known to him and unknown to servant is not avoided by contract with third person to keep secret materials used in process.—Hendrickson v. Continental Fibre Co., 140 A. 659, 3 W.W.Harr., Del., 564.

Common-law duty

It is common-law duty of employer, independent of statute, to warn employee of dangers incident to employment.—Miller v. Paine Lumber Co., 227 N.W. 933, 202 Wis. 77, defendant's motion denied and plaintiff's motion granted 229 N.W. 35, and affirmed 230 N.W. 702, 202 Wis. 77.

Dangers not obvious

A master's duty to warn servant of dangers is to warn of dangers that are not obvious to the servant, or which are not as obvious to the servant as to the master.—Bohlmann v. Penn Electric Corporation, 286 N.W. 552, 232 Wis. 232.

Excusably ignorant

It is the duty of employer to instruct employee regarding a risk of employment of which the employee is excusably ignorant.—Bailey v. Central Vermont Ry., 28 A.2d 639, 113 Vt. 8, reversed on other grounds 63 S.Ct. 1062, 319 U.S. 350, 87 L.Ed. 1444, conformed to 35 A.2d 365, 113 Vt. 433.

"The master owes a duty to his servant to warn him of danger connected with the work which a man of ordinary prudence could not comprehend from the operation involved."—Cummins v. Dufault, 139 P.2d 308, 316, 18 Wash.2d 274.

bound to point out to servants the particular defects and dangers incident thereto.[77]

Whether warning or instruction is necessary may depend on the age,[78] intelligence,[79] and experience[80] of the employee, as well as on the nature of the danger,[81] the character of the work,[82] and the surrounding conditions and circumstances;[83] but the duty does not depend on custom.[84]

Where there is a duty to warn, the master is negligent where he fails so to warn,[85] and he cannot escape responsibility for his failure, even though the danger is one which in the ordinary course of business cannot be avoided,[86] or by reason of his having used the utmost care to reduce the danger as much as possible,[87] nor is it material how or by whom the dangerous conditions were created[88] or that the servant could not have avoided the danger had he known of it.[89]

While it is recognized that the purposes of the law requiring the master to instruct his servant touching his duties, and the nature of the work to which he is assigned, and to warn him of dangers attendant on its execution, are to give to the servant the information which the master has, or ought to have,[90] and which it is presumed that the servant does not have,[91] and to impress on him the necessity of bearing in mind the danger[92] so that he can take steps to protect himself,[93] it is also true that the purpose of the requirement is to give the servant the proper information to enable him to determine whether he will avoid the dangers by refusing to continue in the service[94] or proceed with the work, assuming the risk.[95]

Distinctions. The master's duty to warn a servant has its well-defined limitations as a general proposition of law. Ordinarily it relates only to those nonobvious dangers which are not known to the servant, and which are known or ought to be known to the master. It has its most frequent application in favor of the newly employed or inexperienced servant. In common speech the terms "warn" and "warning" have a much broader application, and they are often used as designating the cries and signals which are used by experienced workmen for mutual convenience and protection and as a part of the method of coöperation.[96] The duty of warning and instructing is entirely distinct from, and independent of, the duty of furnishing reasonably safe premises and appliances, as much so as the duty of furnishing reasonably safe premises is distinct from reasonably safe appliances.[97]

Suspension of relationship. The duty of the master to instruct and warn his servant has been held not to apply where the relationship has been suspended.[98]

§ 285. —— Delegation of Duty

Ordinarily the duty of warning and instructing a servant is a primary duty of the master, and the delegation of such a duty to another servant cannot relieve the master of the responsibility imposed on him by the law.

Ordinarily the duty of warning and instructing a servant is a primary duty of the master, and the delegation of such duty to another servant, whether higher or lower in the scale of employment than the one exposed to danger, cannot relieve the master of the responsibility imposed on him by the law,[99] and nothing short of actual notice of the danger to the workman who is to encounter it will satisfy the requirement of the law.[1] This rule applies with full force and vigor as to warning a young or inexperienced servant,[2] or warning a servant with respect to a new or increased danger[3] or abnormal or extraordinary risks.[4] The delegation of the duty to a person other than a servant does not relieve

the master of liability for a failure to instruct and warn.[5]

On the other hand, it has been held that, where a servant has notice of the general risks and dangers of his employment, the duty of warning the servant of each particular defect is not an absolute nondelegable duty, and the neglect of the servant on whom devolves the duty of giving warning in such a case is not chargeable to the master.[6] This rule applies to such cases as dangers from a defect in a car, where the servant has notice that many of the cars which he is required to handle are defective,[7] or the failure of a station agent to deliver a message containing information as to a specific washout to servants engaged in the repair of a railroad destroyed by a storm at a time when the storm has not yet spent itself,[8] or the fall of material caused by the ordinary operation of excavating in a clay or gravel pit,[9] or the failure of a servant to give notice to other servants of the movement of apparatus being used by them, at least where the master has properly selected and instructed the servant charged with giving notice.[10]

§ 286. —— Knowledge of Master of Defect or Danger

a. In general

b. Imputed knowledge

a. In General

The master's liability with respect to warning and instructing his servant depends on his knowledge, actual or constructive, of the defect or danger to which his servant is exposed, and negligence cannot be imputed to him unless he knows, or, in the exercise of reasonable and ordinary care and diligence, ought to know, that a warning is necessary.

Man of ordinary prudence

Whether employers were negligent in failing to warn employee concerning approximate weight of section of culvert which employee was assisting in removing depended on whether a man of ordinary prudence under same or similar circumstances would have given warning, and, if so, then employers should have given such a warning.—Batson v. Smith, 117 S.W. 2d 731, 196 Ark. 386.

Carbon disulphide gas

Whether employer had duty to warn employees in reeling room in rayon factory of danger of carbon disulphide gas depended on whether employer knew or should have known of possible presence of gas in such degree as to be dangerous to average person.—Bowing v. Delaware Rayon Co., 192 A. 598, 8 W.W.Harr., Del., 339.

Rare and unusual disease

The rare and unusual disease of echinococcosis, which beef washer employed in packing plant contracted, has been held not to constitute such danger of employment as to require the employer to anticipate or to know, with a reasonable degree of certainty, of its existence in the packing plant.—Russo v. Swift & Co., 28 N.W. 291, 136 Neb. 406.

Possibility of continuance of dangerous condition

Where lease provided that landlord should repair heating plant and tenant should do inside painting, and while premises were still under landlord's control, tenant saw hole in floor negligently left by employees of heating contractor engaged by landlord, but left premises before painter employed by him returned from errand, it has been held that painter could not complain of tenant's failure to warn him against possibility of continuance of the dangerous condition, and could not recover from tenant for injuries resulting from falling through the hole.—Weinfeld v. ger, as, for instance, where a servant is engaged in tearing down and repairing the premises,[13] or where his duties are those of an inspector,[14] if the employer has actual knowledge of the danger it is his duty to warn the servant thereof where the latter cannot by the exercise of ordinary care discover it.[15] An employer who orders a servant to work in a place without warning that the place may become dangerous by the unexpected starting of machinery cannot escape liability on the ground that the servant's presence is unknown to another servant whose act in starting the machinery causes the injury, where the injured servant has no knowledge of the threatened danger.[16]

b. Imputed Knowledge

With respect to the duty to warn employees of the hazards of the work, the master is charged with knowledge of the usual and ordinary dangers and hazards to which he is exposing his employees and with knowledge of the nature of the constituents and general characteristics of the substances used in his business.

With respect to the duty to warn employees of the hazards of the work, the master is charged with knowledge of the usual and ordinary dangers and hazards to which he is exposing his employees,[17] and is bound to know the normal condition of his premises[18] and to know of the nature of the constituents and general characteristics of the substances used in his business so that he can give directions for the conduct thereof with ordinary safety to his servants performing the work with ordinary care;[19] and particularly is the master chargeable with a knowledge of risks ascertainable only through a knowledge of scientific facts which an uneducated man is not presumed to know.[20] The

With respect to master's duty to warn servant of risks not ordinarily incident to the employment, master must take into account the action of familiar physical laws.—Moore v.

doctrine which imputes this knowledge to the master is called the doctrine of "assumption of skill,"[21] and for the purpose of determining this knowledge the law has a standard which does not vary with the actual capacity of the particular master,[22] and consequently his ignorance is no excuse for a failure to warn.[23]

On the other hand, it is not proper to make the question of excusing the master for not discovering latent defects turn on the point whether they were such as to deceive human judgment,[24] and the master will not be held liable for a failure to warn where his opportunity for knowledge of a danger is no greater than that of the servant,[25] having in mind that the master's primary duty to make inquiry is superior to that of the servant.[26] A knowledge of conditions indicative of dangers as to which a warning should be given may be charged to the employer where similar occurrences have taken place[27] or where his foreman or other representative has knowledge of the facts.[28] As to dangers arising merely from the manner in which servants perform their duty, amounting to transitory perils, the master is not chargeable with notice thereof.[29]

§ 287. —— Premises Owned by Another

Where a servant is required to perform work on premises owned by another, the master has the duty of warning and instructing the servant of dangerous conditions on such premises of which he has knowledge.

Where a servant is required to perform work on premises owned by another, the master has the duty of warning and instructing the servant of dangerous conditions on such premises of which he has knowledge.[30] While it has been said that the duty of discovering dangerous conditions and instructing the servant with respect thereto where the servant is required to perform work on premises other than the master's is the same as though the ownership of the premises were in the employer,[31] it has also been held that as to a danger incident to employment existing on premises not the master's he need warn only if he knows of it and knows of the servant's ignorance of it.[32] In any event the duty of the master in such a case is no greater than if the ownership were in him.[33]

§ 288. —— Agreement of Master to Give Warning

Where there is a special agreement by the master to warn the servant, the nonperformance of which is the occasion of injury to the latter, the master will be held liable.

employee has been made the subject of statutory regulation.

The duty of an employer to warn and instruct his employee has been made the matter of statutory regulation;[35] and in some instances the duty has been confined to particular occupations, such as mining.[36] It is requisite to an action for injuries resulting from the failure of a statutory duty to warn that the injuries resulted from a failure to warn.[37] Where an employer fails to warn his employee of dangers from machinery not guarded as required by statute, he is liable for any resulting injury unless the employee is guilty of contributory negligence.[38] The rule requiring the master to give a young and inexperienced servant such instructions against the dangers of his employment as will reasonably enable him to avoid injury becomes imperative and inflexible when the servant is employed in violation of a statute.[39] It has been held that, where an employer accepts the provisions of an employers' liability and workmen's compensation act, the only duty he owes is to notify experienced employees of the unusual or extraordinary dangers of the service.[40] Under statutes limiting the fellow-servant doctrine, the master is liable for injuries to a servant resulting from the negligence of fellow servants in failing to warn him of danger.[41]

§ 290. —— Sufficiency and Effect of Warnings and Instructions

The sufficiency of the warning or instruction required to be given to an employee as to the dangers of his employment may depend on a number of factors, including the age, intelligence, and experience of the employee, the nature of the danger, and the character of the work. The failure of a servant to heed a warning constitutes a defense to an action for injuries.

The sufficiency of the warning or instruction required to be given to an employee as to the dangers of his employment may depend on a number of factors, including the age, intelligence, and experience of the employee,[42] the nature of the danger,[43] the character of the work to which the employee is assigned,[44] and other circumstances.[45] Ordinarily, in order to be sufficient, a warning or instruction must be so plain and explicit that the servant will understand and appreciate the danger and know how to avoid it by the exercise of due care,[46] and, where extraordinary risks may be encountered, the servant should be warned of their character and extent, as far as possible.[47] A mere general warning of the dangers to be encountered by the servant is insufficient[48] and an insufficient warning is in legal effect no warning.[49] A warning or instruction as to certain dangers is not sufficient to put the servant on notice as to different perils,[50] and an instruction to an employee not to leave his place of work will not be construed as a warning of the danger of doing so where the purpose of the instruction was to keep the employee at his station until replaced.[51]

It is not necessary that the servant should be warned of every possible manner in which injury may occur to him, or of risks which are as obvious to him as to the master, or which are readily discoverable by him by the use of ordinary care, with such knowledge, experience, and judgment as he actually possesses, or as the master is justified in believing him to possess,[52] and a warning or instruction which gives reasonable notice of the danger[53] or which, if followed, provides for a safe way of doing the work[54] is sufficient. In order to be sufficient the warning should also be given in time to enable the servant to profit by it,[55] or, as has been said, it must be given to the employee before the service involving the danger is required.[56] The ample sufficiency of instructions as to the performance of a particular operation requiring the coöperation of a number of workmen in the course of which a servant is injured may appear from the fact that all the workmen, including the injured servant, without any hesitation and without any further instructions, proceed to perform the work in the manner outlined to them.[57]

Person by whom given. While a master cannot escape the responsibility of giving warning and instructions by delegating the duty to another, the warning or instruction when actually given is sufficient to charge the servant with notice whether given by a person in authority for the master,[58] or a fellow servant,[59] or a stranger;[60] but the instruction so given must be sufficient.[61]

Effect. The failure of a servant to heed a warning constitutes a defense in an action for injuries brought by him,[62] and the giving of due warning relieves the master of liability.[63] While dangers from defects are among the dangers as to which the master must instruct and warn the servant, the master by rules or instructions relating to the use of appliances cannot evade responsibility for the violation of a statute requiring those appliances to be safeguarded.[64]

sulted from the failure of the master properly to warn and instruct the servant, a recovery can be had only where the master's negligence was the proximate cause of the injury.

In an action for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from the failure of the master properly to warn and instruct the servant, a recovery can be had only where the master's negligence was the proximate cause of the injury.[65] The master's failure to warn is the proximate cause of an injury to a servant from a danger unknown to him, and which he could not, by ordinary care, discover, and of which it was the master's duty to warn.[66] The master's failure to instruct and warn the servant of the dangers of his work is not the proximate cause of an injury where it results from an unanticipatable accident[67] or from the negligence of a fellow servant.[68] However, where a master places his servant at a work made dangerous by the nature of the work of other servants, or persons otherwise performing work of which the master has or should have knowledge, he cannot, when injury arises, escape on the plea that, but for the negligence of the coservant or third person, the injury would not have happened.[69] Although a servant without any fault on his part or that of his master has come to a condition of some injury which, unless changed, must result in greater injury, but which condition is not changed because the master has not instructed the servant as to the device at hand for the purpose, the failure of the master to instruct is the proximate cause of the additional injury.[70]

In order to render a master liable for failure to instruct an inexperienced servant, it must appear that injury was the result of servant's unskillfulness or lack of knowledge;[71] hence the failure of an employer to instruct as to the operation of a machine affords no basis for recovery in a suit for injuries caused by it if the servant was not operating it when injured.[72] So, where a servant sustains an injury by reason of a danger which could not have been obviated by warning or instructions, the master's neglect to warn and instruct cannot be said to be the proximate cause of the injury;[73] neither can the master's neglect in this respect be said to be the proximate cause of the injury where the servant is aware of the danger which inflicted his injury,[74] and it is immaterial that the servant is a minor[75] or an inexperienced person.[76] A precise application of this principle is found in those cases wherein the injury results from the fall of material in a mine, the person injured previously having been sufficiently aware of the unsafe conditions.[77] An employer will not be relieved from liability on the ground that the servant was injured by reason of his own negligence where his alleged negligent act was directly induced by the master's negligence in exposing the servant to dangers without any warnings with respect thereto and instructions as to how they could be avoided.[78] If the duty to warn and instruct as to a dangerous agency has not been performed, the fact that the particular manner in which the injury resulted from the agency cannot be determined does not relieve the master from liability.[79]

§ 292. Particular Defects and Dangers

The duty of the master to warn and instruct his servant as to particular defects and dangers is considered infra §§ 293–303.

Examine Pocket Parts for later cases.

§ 293. —— Changes in Appliances or Methods of Work

It is the duty of the master to warn his servants of new or increased dangers caused by a change in his machinery, appliances, or place or methods of work.

It is the duty of the master to warn his servants of new or increased dangers caused by a change in his machinery, appliances, or place or methods of work, and he will be held liable for injuries resulting from his neglect of duty in this respect.[80] This principle applies as well where the place may become dangerous by reason of perils arising from the doing of other work pertaining to the master's business, different from that in which the particular servant is engaged.[81] The fact that the effect of a change made in machinery was to reduce risk of accident to the employees generally who work on it is immaterial in an action for injuries based on the fact that it was rendered unsafe for the injured employee, who, without notice of the change, had a right to suppose that he encountered no risks in operating it other than those to which he was exposed when operating the machine before the change was made.[82] A master is not required to warn a servant regarding dangers arising from a change in conditions where the very nature of the servant's employment puts him on inquiry as to the dangers likely to arise from the changing conditions.[83]

§ 294. —— Dangers from Negligence of Fellow Servants

Ordinarily the master need not warn his servant against possible or probable dangers from the negligence of fellow servants.

Ordinarily the master has a right to assume that his servants, being competent, will not be negligent, and it is not his duty, on employing a servant, to warn him against possible or probable dangers in case he is negligent,[84] and it is immaterial that the servant so employed is a minor and inexperienced.[85] The principle, however, is not applicable where the danger arises from the continued and repeated negligent acts of a fellow servant so that the master is presumed to know of the dangers;[86] and a master who knows that a need of warning an inexperienced servant has arisen is bound to give it, although the danger arose from the negligence of a fellow servant.[87] A master may not stand by without giving warning where the negligence of a fellow servant has become apparent to him.[88]

§ 295. —— Dangers Known to Servant

Where a servant knows and appreciates the dangers of his employment, the master is under no obligation to give warning and instructions thereof, and a like result follows where, by the exercise of reasonable care, the servant could have known of the dangers likely to be encountered by him.

Where a servant knows and appreciates the dangers of his employment, the master is under no obligation to give warning and instructions thereof,[89] and a like result follows where, by the exercise of reasonable care, the servant could have known of the dangers likely to be encountered by him.[90] Accordingly, where the servant is as familiar as the master with the situation and the manner of performing the work, the master is under no duty to instruct him as to any risks,[91] nor need a master warn or instruct as to dangers arising from matters of common knowledge,[92] including those arising from the well-known operation of natural forces.[93]

Reason for rule

A warning is never required from a master to a servant when the servant is apprised of the peril, or where it is obvious and appreciated, and this because the law does not require a useless thing to be done.—Clark v. Wheelock, Mo.App., 293 S. W. 456—39 C.J. p 499 note 3 [a].

Knowledge of various dangers precluding necessity for warning

Dangers readily ascertainable

A master is not required to point out dangers where they are readily ascertainable by servant himself if he makes an ordinarily careful use of such knowledge, experience, and judgment as he possesses, or where servant had all means necessary for ascertaining the conditions and there was no concealed danger which could not be discovered.

Equal knowledge

(1) Where employee's knowledge of the perils of the employment equal or surpass that of the master, there is no duty on the master to apprise the employee of something already well known to him.—J. L. Williams & Sons v. Tompkins, 114 S.W.2d 845, 195 Ark. 1146—Kurn v. Fanbus, 84 S.W.2d 602, 191 Ark. 232.

(2) Where employee who had spent most of life on farm was gored by employer's bull when he came within about six inches from stanchion from which bull, as employee knew, was able to withdraw head, employer had no superior knowledge of risk so as to impose duty on him to warn employee.—Quimby v. Shattuck, 187 A. 479, 88 N.H. 262.

(3) City secretary who was office man and ignorant of method of operating tractor owed no duty to instruct city employee as to use of tractor, where such employee had greater knowledge of tractors than secretary.—City of Munday v. Shaw, Tex.Civ.App., 100 S.W.2d 765, error dismissed.

from the very nature of the work itself.[95] It has been held that where the servant has the requisite knowledge it is immaterial that the particular danger arose out of an act performed by the servant in obedience to an order of his foreman.[96] The mere fact that the servant momentarily forgot the perils surrounding him does not show any fault on the part of the master.[97]

Where the employee knows and appreciates that there is serious danger, the duty to warn him of possible danger does not arise simply because he does not appreciate the precise extent of the danger.[98] If, however, the servant has knowledge of the facts, but is entirely ignorant of the risks involved, it is the duty of the master to warn him,[99] particularly where the condition is extrahazardous.[1]

It has been held that the master need not warn or instruct the servant as to the danger of being caught between the rollers of machinery.[2] It has also been held that no warning or instruction need be given to an experienced carpenter,[3] or to linemen as to various operations connected with their employment,[4] or to a machinist as to the use of a vise and wrench in fitting gas pipes,[5] or to a person familiar with the operation of machinery as to the dangers thereof,[6] or to painters as to the use of a ladder,[7] or to a logger as to the hazards of his trade,[8] or to an experienced employee engaged in blasting as to the hazards of his work,[9] or to an experienced foreman as to the proper manner of lowering structural steel,[10] or to a "rigger" as to moving timbers along crossbeams,[11] or to a cooper as to the proper method of swelling barrels with steam and water,[12] or to an experienced servant as to the proper way of putting a belt over a pulley,[13] or to an experienced freight handler of the insecurity of an unfinished pile of bales,[14] or to an experienced mine worker as to the various risks likely to be met by him,[15] or to an experienced teamster as to the dangers of a hinged seat on a wagon,[16] or as to the absence of a hood in a dough mixer to a servant who has operated a dough mixer equipped with a hood and is familiar with machinery and was educated as an electrical engineer.[17]

the rule where it is open and obvious to the senses of any man of ordinary intelligence,[19] or where it is as easily discernible by the employee as by the master,[20] or where it is discoverable in the exercise of that reasonable care which persons of ordinary intelligence may be expected to take for their own safety.[21] An employer, however, is not relieved of the duty to warn an employee whom he puts to work in a place of danger by the fact that the conditions constituting the danger are obvious, if the employee does not know or appreciate, and reasonably should not know or appreciate, the danger thus created.[22]

on a roof,[33] or danger from falling where the servant is working in a perilous position,[34] or where the fall was caused by a condition actually known to the servant,[35] or plainly obvious to him.[36]

A master need not warn as to obvious dangers connected with the handling of heavy objects,[37] or apparent dangers connected with the tearing down of structures,[38] or where the injury results from the fall of a pile of materials, the danger being apparent,[39] or from overhanging banks in gravel pits,[40] or from the fall of material during the operation of a steam shovel,[41] or dangers from falling of trees or limbs to those engaged in logging or wood cutting operations,[42] or from being struck by a logging cable,[43] or danger to a workman engaged in painting iron columns while they are being loaded on a car,[44] or dangers arising from an obvious defect in the insulation of an electric wire[45] or from the presence of splinters or nails in planks forming part of a staging,[46] or from stepping on a visibly loose board or plank.[47]

A master is not bound to warn employees of mature age and discretion of the obvious danger of stepping into a pool of steaming water in plain view,[48] or of the danger to a fireman using sawdust and shavings for fuel, as a result of which a backfire or explosion ensues.[49] A servant is not required to be warned of the danger of boarding cars while in motion,[50] or alighting therefrom and landing on a place made dangerous by gravel, the presence of which was known by the servant,[51] or of getting a foot under a car wheel;[52] nor need railway employees be warned of dangers because of the limited clearance between a car and a doorway entry,[53] or a freight platform;[54] nor is a railroad company bound to instruct and point out to an experienced servant the location and distance of the abutments, bridges, poles, and switches along the line of its track;[55] neither is it negligence to direct an employee to board a switch engine, and to fail to warn him of the danger of engines or trains moving on the tracks,[56] or to fail to warn a servant of the dangers of operating a small push car in railroad yards.[57] A master need not warn an employee of ordinary intelligence of the approach of airplanes.[58]

§ 297. —— Work Done in Improper Manner

As a general rule a master need not anticipate that his servant will perform his work in an improper manner, and he is not bound to warn his servant of dangers resulting from an improper method adopted by the servant of performing his task.

A master is not bound to warn his servant of dangers resulting from an improper method adopted by the servant of performing his task, and, as a rule, need not anticipate that the work will not be performed in a proper manner,[59] and need not give warning of dangers which can arise only through the servant's disobedience of instructions.[60] Although, where there are two ways to perform work, one safe and one unsafe, the servant must adopt the safe way if he knows or might know of it in the exercise of ordinary care,[61] in the absence of this knowledge on the part of the servant, it is the duty of the employer to instruct as to the proper method of doing the work,[62] and point out the dangers connected with the unsafe method,[63] and on his failure to do so, he cannot complain that the servant has adopted the unsafe method of doing the work,[64] but, on the contrary, will be held liable for any resulting injury;[65] and in such case it is immaterial that the servant had some knowledge of the dangers involved in his method of doing the work.[66]

§ 298. —— Unusual or Improbable Dangers

The master is not required to warn his servant of unexpected, improbable, or unusual dangers.

A master is under no obligation to warn his servant of a special danger which springs out of a particular fact, which in its details cannot be anticipated,[67] or generally of any dangers which cannot be reasonably apprehended;[68] in other words, the master is not required to caution a servant against unexpected, improbable, and unusual occurrences,[69] where there is no appearance of danger,[70] and his duty to warn is limited to such perils as may reasonably be anticipated.[71]

§ 299. —— Risks Naturally Incident to Service

Where the risks or dangers are naturally incident to the employment, there is no obligation on the master to warn or instruct, unless secret dangers exist of which he has knowledge and the servant has not.

Where the risks or dangers are naturally incident to the employment, there is no obligation on the master to warn or instruct,[72] unless secret dangers exist of which he has knowledge and the servant has not,[73] and the master has knowledge of the servant's ignorance.[74]

§ 300. —— Simple Methods and Appliances

The master is not bound to instruct the servant as to simple tasks, or as to the use of simple appliances or devices.

Where a master employs workmen to do simple tasks, requiring only average strength and intelligence, he is not bound either to instruct the laborers or to inquire into their experience,[75] and the same rule holds true where the appliances and devices which the servant is required to use are of a simple character.[76]

§ 301. —— Dangers from Extraneous Causes

Where the master has knowledge that the particular employment is, from extraneous causes, hazardous or dangerous to a degree beyond what it fairly imports or is understood by the servant to be, he is bound to inform him of the fact.

Where the master has knowledge that the particular employment is, from extraneous causes, hazardous or dangerous to a degree beyond what it fairly imports or is understood by the servant to be, he is bound to inform him of the fact, and, if he fails to do so, he is liable for such damages as the servant may sustain by reason of such causes.[77]

§ 302. —— Dangers from Work outside Scope of Employment

Where a servant is ordered to do work outside of the scope of his employment, the master is under the same obligation to warn and instruct him as though he were engaged in his regular employment.

Where a servant is ordered to do work outside of the scope of his employment, the master is under the same obligation to warn and instruct him as though he were engaged in his regular employment,[78] but

Determinative inquiry in action against employer for injuries to employee, on whom sign fell when fellow employee, whom plaintiff was assisting to raise it to top of post, released his hold thereon as result of post tipping, was not whether defendant's representative, directing work, should have anticipated that accident would happen precisely as it did, but whether chance of sign falling because of insecure post was so great that ordinary employer in defendant's position would have recognized danger and warned plaintiff thereof.—Perreault v. the duty does not exist merely because of the change of employment; it arises only when the scope of the new employment is of such character that a warning is required.[79] The master is not chargeable with negligence for failing to warn a servant of danger where he is injured while working outside of the scope of his employment, voluntarily and without orders,[80] or where he performs a dangerous act which has been forbidden,[81] or works in a place where he has been forbidden to work.[82]

The rule requiring warning and instruction as to dangers of which the employer has actual or constructive knowledge, and knowledge of which is not charged to the employee, has been applied to particular dangers.

The rule requiring warning and instruction as to dangers of which the employer has actual or constructive knowledge, and knowledge of which is not charged to the employee, has been applied to dangers from falling objects;[83] from the fall of the walls or roof of a mine,[84] quarry,[85] excavation,[86] or structure;[87] from the fall of materials improperly piled;[88] dangers from coming into contact with wires[89] or other places[90] charged with dangerous electric current; dangers involved in the handling of heavy objects;[91] or from the vicious propensities of animals;[92] or defects in a track,[93] or from obstructions in too close proximity therewith.[94]

The rule has also been applied to dangerous machinery,[95] or appliances,[96] or defects therein;[97] as to the properties of dangerous chemicals,[98] or the presence of poisonous fumes,[99] or dust;[1] or the dangers of occupational disease;[2] the dangerous countered are ordinarily incident to the employment,[24] and applies as well to a servant who is engaged in making a dangerous place safe as to any other class of employees.[25]

Although the duty of a master to warn and instruct an inexperienced servant is more imperative when the servant is a minor,[26] the duty is owed as well to employees of more mature age who by reason of inexperience do not appreciate the dangers of their employment;[27] and this has been held to be true, even though they are experienced in similar work.[28] A master need not warn an inexperienced servant of possible dangers in the performance of his duties, where experience and instruction are not necessary to enable him to do his work with safety.[29] Where an employer not only fails to warn an inexperienced servant of danger but induces him to perform a dangerous act by an assurance of safety, the employer is guilty of negligence unless the danger is obvious to a person of ordinary intelligence.[30]

Assumption of employee's knowledge or experience. In the absence of knowledge to the contrary, a master may assume that a servant has the knowledge and discernment which a person of his age and intelligence ordinarily possesses;[31] on the other hand, the employer must anticipate that a minor will exercise such care only as is usual among children of the same age, capacity, and experience, and must instruct and warn him accordingly,[32] and it has been held that a master cannot assume that a school-boy working during vacation is experienced.[33] The rule has been laid down that, where a master knows the great danger to an inexperienced man in doing a particular kind of work, which can be done safely only after experience and training, he cannot assume that every adult man in possession of his ordinary faculties has the skill and experience necessary to do that work, the nature of the work being a fact which must be taken into consideration in determining the master's negligence in directing or permitting a servant to engage in such extrahazardous occupation,[34] and it has been declared that, where the dangers are hidden, the mas-

A master who with knowledge of the dangerous character of an act he desires to have done commands a young and inexperienced servant who is unaware of the dangers and risks involved to perform it without apprising him of the dangers or giving adequate instruction as to how to do it with safety is guilty of actionable negligence.—Jenkins v. ter may not assume that the servant is familiar with them but must warn and instruct the servant unless the latter has actual knowledge of the dangers.[35]

Representations by servant as to age or experience. The rule that a master need not warn and instruct a servant where the latter makes express representations as to his experience and capacity, as discussed supra § 305, has been applied to an infant employee who has reached the age of discretion, and who assures his employer that he understands the duties of his position.[36] A mere expression of willingness by a minor employee who is inexperienced,[37] or by an inexperienced employee,[38] to undertake perilous work, does not relieve the employer of the duty to give proper instructions. Where the master has actual knowledge of the servant's inexperience, the representation of the servant that he has had experience in the work for which he was hired does not operate as an estoppel so as to preclude the necessity for warning.[39] It has been held that the mere fact that a minor servant misrepresented his age would not estop him from showing that he was young and inexperienced, and should be treated as only a circumstance the jury might consider in solving the question whether or not the master had exercised reasonable care in not warning him of the presence of a danger which would be unknown to an inexperienced laborer.[40]

b. Dangers Known to Servant

The mere fact of a servant's inexperience or minority does not charge the master with the duty to warn and instruct him, if he in fact knows and appreciates the dangers of the employment.

The mere fact of the servant's inexperience or minority does not charge the master with the duty to warn and instruct him, if he in fact knows and appreciates the dangers of the employment.[41] However, the mere fact that a young or inexperienced servant knows that the employment is dangerous is not sufficient to relieve the master from the duty of warning and instructing him where he does not fully appreciate the risks.[42]

c. Obvious Dangers

As a general rule, the master is not required to warn and instruct an inexperienced or youthful servant as to risks and dangers which are patent and obvious to persons of ordinary intelligence.

As a general rule, the master is not required to warn and instruct an inexperienced or youthful servant as to risks and dangers which are patent and obvious to persons of ordinary intelligence.[43] In determining what dangers are obvious and apparent, within the rule, the experience or lack of experience of the servant must be considered;[44] and, if, through youth, inexperience, or other cause, a servant is incompetent fully to understand and

d. Applications of Rule

The rule requiring the master to warn and instruct his inexperienced or youthful servant as to the dangers of the employment has been applied to particular dangers.

The rule requiring the master to warn and instruct his inexperienced or youthful servant as to the dangers of the employment has been applied where the servant was injured while working in a new or more dangerous service than that to which he had been accustomed;[46] or working outside the scope of his employment;[47] or where the servant has been injured while working about[48] or operating[49] dangerous or complicated machinery, and specifically such machines as a laundry mangle,[50] elevator,[51] planer,[52] saw,[53] or tractor;[54] or where the servant was injured while working with dangerous or defective apparatus;[55] or while engaged in excavating[56] or building operations,[57] or mining.[58]

A master should warn and instruct his young or inexperienced servant where the latter is working as a lineman,[59] or about places dangerously charged with electricity,[60] or where his duties require him to work with dynamite or other dangerous explosive,[61] or where he is required to couple cars,[62] or perform various duties when employed by a railroad company;[63] and it has been held that a master should warn and instruct his inexperienced workman with respect to the dangers incident to the use of simple appliances when it is the reasonable thing to do.[64] An employer has been held liable for injuries in the absence of warning or instruction where he ordered a boy to splice a wire, broken in the course of winding on a spool;[65] where his foreman directed inexperienced and ignorant employees to go on a disarranged and slippery pile of lumber;[66] where his inexperienced laborer worked near a mass of kainit made dangerous by the softening effect of rain;[67] where he impliedly directed his young and inexperienced servant to return a boat across a stream with an extraordinarily swift current;[68] and where a minor servant fell into a vat of boiling water and oil while skimming it with unsafe appliances furnished by the master without warning of the danger in doing the work under such conditions.[69]

e. Sufficiency of Warnings or Instructions

It is the duty of a master who employs a servant in a place of danger to give him such warning and instruction as are reasonably required by his youth, inexperience, or want of capacity, and as will enable him, with the exercise of reasonable care, to perform the duties of his employment with reasonable safety to himself.

It is the duty of a master who employs a servant in a place of danger to give him such warning and instruction as is reasonably required by his youth, inexperience, or want of capacity, and as will enable him, with the exercise of reasonable care, to perform the duties of his employment with reasonable safety to himself;[70] to this end the danger and its nature and extent should be pointed out,[71] and the method of avoiding it shown.[72] Where the servant is a minor, the master must put his warning in such plain language as to be sure that the servant understands and appreciates the danger. It is not enough that he should do his best to make the servant understand; he must actually understand and appreciate the danger.[73]

While it is doubtless true that it is the servant's duty to observe the instructions of his employer,[74] and on this assumption it has been held that in the absence of knowledge that his minor employee is not, the master has a right to assume that he is conforming to them,[75] it has also been held that the employer in the proper discharge of his duty must not only warn a child of tender years against danger but take additional precautions against the servant's carelessness and forgetfulness,[76] and that the warning must be repeated if necessary.[77] Although it has been held that a minor servant need not be warned of the danger of disobeying the orders of his superior,[78] there is also authority to the contrary.[79] The giving of proper instructions will not relieve an employer from liability to a youthful and inexperienced employee, if the work required of him is not such as ought to be required of a person of his capacity.[80]

Operation of cumbersome combine
An experienced farmer, knowing of danger of operating cumbersome combine, driven by him, on hilly ground, having notice of probability that it might overturn on steep decline, and failing to look to see whether boy employed by him to fill, tie, and release bags of threshed oats was on platform of combine or walking behind it as instructed, has been held guilty of negligence for boy's death as result of combine overturning on curve down hill while boy was on platform.—Verna v. E. FELLOW SERVANTS

1. Number, Competency, and Supervision

§ 307. Number

The master is under a duty to furnish a sufficient number of persons to perform the required services or to do the particular piece of work in hand, and the master may be liable for injury to his servant which is caused by a violation of such duty.

It is the duty of the master to furnish a sufficient number of persons to perform the services required[81] or to do the particular piece of work in hand,[82] his duty resting on the principle that the master is bound to furnish proper tools and appliances,[83] or, according to some cases, on the principle that the master is bound to exercise due care to provide reasonably safe means and methods of work.[84] The duty is primary and absolute[85] and is nondelegable,[86] and generally, when the master's failure to perform it is the proximate cause of an injury to the servant, he must answer therefor,[87]

Request for help

Where a servant requests additional help to perform the work and is directed by the foreman to proceed, and the servant proceeds and is injured without any negligence on his part, the master is liable.—Lewis v. American Car & Foundry Co., Mo. App., 3 S.W.2d 282.

unless the servant has assumed the risk, as discussed infra § 390, or is guilty of contributory negligence, as discussed infra § 451. So the master is liable where, by misrepresentation of the conditions of a particular piece of labor as to which his knowledge is greater than that of the servant, he induces the servant to attempt to perform it with an inadequacy of fellow servants, to the servant's resulting injury.[88]

Want of funds does not excuse a failure to employ a sufficient number of servants for the work.[89]

§ 308. —— Extent of Duty, and Degree of Care Required

Generally it is the duty of the master to furnish a force sufficient to do the work with reasonable safety to those engaged in the accomplishment of the work.

As the rule is ordinarily stated, it is the duty of the master to furnish a sufficient number of men to do the work in which the servant is engaged with reasonable safety[90] or with reasonable safety to all those engaged in its accomplishment,[91] or, as sometimes stated, it is the duty of the master to furnish sufficient servants or workmen to prevent the exposure of a servant to unnecessary risk or peril[92] or to prevent exposure to that class of hazards which results from an inadequate force to do the work.[93] The master, however, is not an insurer, as discussed supra § 171, and is liable only in case he has been negligent,[94] the duty imposed on him being that of exercising reasonable[95] or ordinary[96] care, and the precautions which he is required to take are only such as a reasonably prudent person might have foreseen as necessary to prevent the injury.[97]

Safe and reasonable method with available force
Employer is not negligent for inadequacy of force to do specific work where safe and reasonable way exists to do work with force in hand. —Seymour v. Holman, 158 So. 525, 229 Ala. 634.

Fact that track laborer had loaded seven rails with same assistance showed work could be accomplished with safety by force then employed, with respect to alleged negligence in failing to furnish sufficient men.—Lloyd v. Norfolk & W. Ry. Co., 145 S.E. 372, 151 Va. 409.

Evans, 175 S.W.2d 249, 142 Tex. 1.

(3) Failure of operator of filling station to have some employee on hand to direct drivers of automobiles coming into station to stop their automobiles at such places as would avoid injuring other employees engaged in the duties of servicing automobiles, in the absence of evidence that it was customary for operators of filling stations to take such precaution.—Fuller v. Notice of physical condition
Employer, not being advised of workman's condition, was entitled to assume that workman was in ordinary physical condition and was not chargeable with negligence for failing to provide sufficient number of men to assist with assigned task unless employer failed to provide sufficient workmen to assist a person of ordinary physique to perform in safety the work required.
Ky.—Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Willhite, 187 S.W.2d 1010, 300 Ky. 75.
Tex.—Texas & P. Ry. Co. v. Rampy,

The employer discharges his duty in this respect where he has provided sufficient help presently available and subject to the request for assistance.[98] The master is chargeable with knowledge of the facts which it is his duty to know in the conduct of his business.[99]

§ 309. —— Maintaining Force

Generally it is the duty of the master to see that a sufficient number of servants remains sufficient for the reasonable safety of each of them.

The obligation of the master to furnish an adequate number of servants is not relaxed at any time.[1] It is his duty to see that the number of servants engaged in the work in hand remains sufficient for the reasonable safety of each of them,[2] and not to withdraw a portion of the force employed on a particular piece of work undertaken until the portion withdrawn can safely be dispensed with.[3] In case, however, the master has provided an adequate number of servants, he is not liable for injuries caused by the absence of one of them from his post of duty without the master's knowledge or consent.[4] On the other hand, the temporary absence of a servant does not justify the undertaking of the work by the master with an insufficient number,[5] nor does the failure of some of those hired for the work to appear,[6] and where, by reason of the employer's conduct, it becomes necessary for employees temporarily to absent themselves, it is the duty of the master to suspend the work or supply others for their places during their absence.[7] Where the absence is that of a vice principal, and by reason of his absence the work is without proper superintendence, the master is liable for an injury occurring by reason of his absence.[8]

§ 310. —— Proximate Cause

In order to render the master liable for injury to a servant on the alleged ground of failure to comply with the duty to furnish a sufficient number of servants, such failure must be the proximate cause of the injury.

The fact alone that the master fails to employ a sufficient number of men to do the work does not in itself give rise to a cause of action.[9] The inadequacy of the force must be the proximate cause of the injury,[10] and the master is not liable where the injury results from pure accident,[11] or from the negligent acts or conduct of the men assisting the injured servant,[12] or from the act of the employee in voluntarily doing work alone without assistance,[13] or directing his assistants to leave him and do other things.[14]

§ 311. Competency

A master owes to his servant the duty to employ and retain only competent fellow servants or coemployees; such duty is nondelegable and generally the master is liable for an injury caused by a violation of such duty.

A master owes to his servant the duty to employ and retain only competent fellow servants or coemployees.[15] The duty of the master to use due care in this respect is one which is imposed by law[16] and this duty is positive[17] and personal or primary[18] and is nondelegable.[19]

Where a master negligently or knowingly employs or retains in his service an incompetent servant, in violation of his duty in this respect, generally he is liable for an injury sustained by a coservant by reason of such incompetency[20] unless the circumstances are such that the injured servant must be regarded as having assumed the risk, under rules discussed infra §§ 362, 390, or as having been guilty of contributory negligence in relying on the care of a fellow servant, under rules discussed infra § 430. The rule that the master is liable does not apply, however, where the employee has made it a condition of his consent to accept the service that the employer will yield in his favor the right of freedom of action as to selection and superintendence,[21] or, under some circumstances, where the injured servant is a vice principal intrusted by the master with complete control and supervision of the work and the method of doing it.[22] The mere fact, however, that the injured servant selected the servants to work with him does not relieve the master of liability where his right of selection was limited to a group in which no competent servants were available.[23] The rule imposing liability on the master in such case has been regarded as an exception to the rule, discussed infra § 321, that the master is not liable to one servant for injuries due to the negligence of another servant.[24]

Ability to ascertain whether other servants negligent
If in the nature of things one workman cannot ascertain whether other workmen are careful or negligent, it would be unfair to hold such workman, rather than the master who has the duty to employ competent workmen, responsible for the negligence of a coworker.—Curtie v. The fellow servant or coemployee must actually have been incompetent in order to render the master liable.[25] It has been held that the master is not liable on the theory of his failure to employ or provide a competent employee for acts of an employee which are not within the scope of the employment,[26] including the acts of a vice principal,[27] and that this rule applies with respect to acts which may be classified as pranks.[28]

§ 312. —— Care Required of Master

At common law the master is not an insurer of the competency of his servants; the obligation imposed on him in this respect is to exercise ordinary or reasonable care under all the circumstances.

The master is not at common law an insurer of the competency of his servants;[29] his duty is measured by the exercise of ordinary[30] or reasonable[31] care under all the circumstances, regard being had to the consequences which may result from incompetency,[32] such care as men of ordinary care and prudence acting under the same or similar circumstances, or engaged in the same or similar business on their own account, are in the habit of exercising.[33] It is not necessary that the servants be the best that can be secured.[34] The mere fact that a fellow servant is careless does not establish negligence of the master in failing to furnish a competent and skillful fellow servant.[35] However, the employment or retention of a dangerous or vicious servant whose presence may expose coemployees to greater dangers than the work necessarily entails may constitute negligence.[36]

§ 313. —— Definition and Tests of Competency

a. In general
b. Inexperience or youth
c. Physical disability
d. Habits

a. In General

In order to be competent, a servant must be both capable and reasonably careful, and what constitutes incompetency of a servant depends on and varies with the nature of the duties he is called on to perform.

A competent servant within the meaning of the rule under consideration is one who is reasonably safe for the performance of the duties assigned to him,[37] "competency" in this connection requiring

Insane patients

A nurse who was employed in a sanitarium for the insane, and whose duty it was to supervise women patients who worked in sanitarium's laundry, could not recover from corporation which operated sanitarium and which employed her, for burns sustained by her when a patient tripped on a floor mat and caused steam press to close on nurse's forearm, merely because corporation permitted incompetent patients to perform laundry work.—Cox v. Investigation and affirmative inquiry

(1) Where the service in which the servant is to be employed is such as to endanger the lives of persons and coemployees, the master, before engaging such servant, is required to make reasonable investigation into such servant's character, skill, and habits.—Producers' & Refiners' Corporation v. (2) The master is bound to institute affirmative inquiries in order to ascertain the qualifications of a servant whom he transfers to a more responsible position, for which special qualifications are necessary, unless the servant has given proof of his capacity in some similar position.—Producers' & Refiners' Corporation v. Castile, 246 P. 615, 118 Okl. 42—Producers' & Refiners' Corporation v. Castile, 214 P. 121, 89 Okl. 261.

Reliability

(1) It has been laid down that a competent man is a reliable man.—Coppins v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co., 25 N.E. 915, 122 N.Y. 557, 19 that the servant be both capable and reasonably careful.[38] What constitutes incompetency in an employee depends on, and varies with, the nature of the duties he is called on to perform[39] and his relation to other persons.[40] So an employee may be incompetent because of physical deficiencies, discussed infra subdivision c of this section, or mental deficiencies,[41] such as lack of knowledge,[42] skill,[43] or experience, discussed infra subdivision b of this section, or his youth, discussed infra subdivision b of this section. So also an employee may be incompetent because of the lack of a disposition to use his ability and experience properly whether arising from carelessness[44] or viciousness.[45] The inefficiency must, however, exist to such a degree as to affect the general character of the employee in the capacity in which he is employed and to indicate that he is not a reasonably reliable and safe man for the work.[46]

b. Inexperience or Youth

Lack of experience or youth does not necessarily render a servant incompetent, but either may be an element of incompetency.

In the absence of statutory regulation, discussed infra § 314, an employee is not necessarily incompetent merely because he is inexperienced in the particular work in which he is employed,[47] but, where the nature of a servant's work is such as to require experience for its reasonably safe performance, his inexperience may be sufficient to show his incompetency.[48] Likewise ordinarily a servant is not in-

Particular type of work

Employer had duty of employing men whose judgment and mental capacity was such that trees which they were employed to cut would be felled so as not unnecessarily to endanger fellow servants.—Putnam Lumber Co. v. Tompkins, 150 So. 712, 112 Fla. 635.

39 C.J. p 530 note 49.

Ignorance of language

(1) With respect to the employment of persons who cannot understand and speak the English language, the question as to the responsibility of the master involves the competency of such persons for the particular tasks to which they are assigned.—Courtois v. American Car & Foundry Co., Mo.App., 282 S. W. 484.

(2) Employment of such persons is not of itself negligence.—Courtois v. American Car & Foundry Co., supra.

(3) Their employment constitutes negligence, however, where the work requires coöperation, coördination, and action in response to spoken orders and is unsafe in the absence of such elements.—Courtois v. American Car & Foundry Co., supra.

Element of competency

45. Miss.—Hines v. Green, 87 So 649, 125 Miss. 476.

Assault

Employer who had knowledge that his employee was belligerent and was guilty of vicious conduct, was liable for injuries sustained by fellow employee assaulted by the first employee on ground that employer was guilty of breach of duty of care to select and retain in his employ only servants from whose conduct there was not an unreasonable risk of harm to other servants.—Bomba v. Borowicz, 38 N.Y.S.2d 403, 265 App.Div. 198.

Individual nature or disposition

A vicious or dangerous tendency on part of employee, on which liability of employer for employee's acts may be predicated, must inhere in the nature or disposition of the employee as an individual, and such innate proclivity must be prone to a ready revelation in an unwarranted display of excessive force, and there must exist such a deviation from normal temper as to make exposure to probability of its manifestation an unusual hazard.—Country Club of Jackson v. Turner, 4 So.2d 718, 192 Miss. 510.

46. Wis.—Kliefoth v. Northwestern Iron Co., 74 N.W. 356, 98 Wis. 495.

competent merely because he is youthful,[49] but the youth of a servant may be considered on the question of his competency to do the work assigned him;[50] and it has been held that a boy less than fourteen years of age is presumed to be incompetent to perform duties involving the personal safety of others, which require judgment, discretion, and care greater than usually possessed by boys of such age.[51]

c. Physical Disability

A physical disability of a servant does not necessarily render him incompetent, but a disability which prevents a proper discharge of duties may constitute incompetency.

An employee is not incompetent merely because he has a physical disability[52] unless his disability is such as to prevent the proper performance of his duties.[53]

d. Habits

Habits of a servant, such as habitual carelessness or drinking intoxicating liquors to excess, may render such servant incompetent.

A servant otherwise competent may be rendered incompetent by reason of habits which make it imprudent to employ or retain him in the particular work assigned him.[54] Thus a person may be incompetent if he is habitually careless[55] or if his acts of negligence characterize him as a careless workman.[56] Generally, where habitual negligence of a fellow servant is relied on to impose liability on the master, it must be shown that the negligence which caused the injury was habitual.[57] Ordinarily a single act of negligence does not show that negligence is a characteristic of the employee,[58] although the act may be of such a character as per se to show incompetence.[59]

A servant may be incompetent because of the habit of drinking intoxicating liquors to excess,[60] but the fact that an employee is occasionally under the influence of drink does not ordinarily authorize a finding that he was rendered incompetent thereby,[61] and even the fact that a servant is an habitual drunkard does not necessarily show incompetency.[62]

§ 314. —— Statutory Requirements

The master may be the insurer of the competency of servants under statutes which require particular qualifications for servants employed in designated positions, and the master may be liable for injuries to a fellow servant caused by an incompetent servant employed in violation of a statute.

Statutory provisions sometimes require particular qualifications as to servants employed in designated positions,[63] and the master may be made an insurer of the competency of such servants,[64] thus abrogating the common-law rule, discussed supra § 312, that only reasonable care and diligence in ascertaining the competence of servants are required of the master.[65] Generally the employment of a servant by a master in violation of statutory provisions constitutes negligence per se,[66] or at least is competent evidence of the negligence of the master, as discussed infra § 508, so as to charge the master with liability for injuries to a fellow servant caused by the incompetent employee.[67] Under statutes abolishing the fellow-servant rule, discussed infra § 345, it is not material whether the master negligently or knowingly employs or retains incompetent servants whose incompetence caused the injury.[68]

§ 315. —— Servant Temporarily Substituted for Another

A servant who is temporarily designated to perform the duties of another servant must be competent to perform such duties.

Where a servant is temporarily designated to perform the duties of another servant, he must be competent to perform those duties properly.[69]

§ 316. —— Retention of Incompetent Servant

The retention by the master of an incompetent servant after the master has reasonable notice of incompetency may constitute negligence.

Since it is the duty of the master to use due care to see that fellow servants are competent, the retention of an incompetent employee after the master has reasonable notice, either actual or constructive, of such incompetence will constitute negligence on the part of the master.[70] Accordingly, where an employer has notice of vicious conduct on the part of an employee, the retention of such employee may constitute negligence rendering him liable to a fellow employee for injuries sustained by reason of an assault.[71] In the absence of knowledge of the employee's incompetence, the master may act on the presumption that a servant found to be competent will continue so.[72]

§ 317. —— Master's Knowledge of Incompetency

The master is chargeable with knowledge of the incompetency of a servant if in the exercise of due care he could have ascertained it; and he is also chargeable with knowledge which has been, or should have been, obtained by one who represents him in respect of his duty to hire and retain competent servants.

In order to charge a master with negligence in employing or retaining an incompetent servant in his service it must be shown, in the absence of statutory regulation, discussed supra § 314, that the master had either actual or constructive knowledge of such incompetency.[73] Actual knowledge on the part of the master of the incompetency is not essential;[74] the knowledge may be constructive[75] and the master is chargeable with knowledge of the incompetency if in the exercise of due care he could have ascertained it.[76] Generally, constructive knowledge which will bind the master may also be the knowledge possessed by one who represents him in respect of his positive duty to exercise reasonable care in the selection or retention of his servants,[77] or such knowledge as the representative ought to have acquired in the proper discharge of his duties as a representative of his master.[78] However, according to some cases, it seems that, unless such representative has the power to hire and discharge employees, his knowledge is not im-putable to the master.[79] Under some circumstances the law may impute to the master knowledge of an employee's incompetency by reason of such employee's general reputation for incompetency[80] which has existed for a sufficient period.[81]

§ 318. —— Proximate Cause of Injury

The incompetency of the servant must be the proximate cause of the injury in order to render a master liable on the theory that he employed or retained an incompetent servant.

In order to render a master liable for injuries to an employee on the ground of negligence in employing or retaining an incompetent servant, the incompetency of such servant must be the proximate cause of the injury.[82] According to some cases, the master is liable for the act of an unskillful fellow servant, where there has been negligence in the employment of such servant, on the theory that the negligence in employing such servant is the proximate cause of the injury.[83] The master may be liable where the injury sustained is the natural and probable consequence of negligence in employing incompetent fellow servants or coemployees, even though the particular injury could not have been foreseen.[84] The fact that the incompetent servant acted in violation of orders will not relieve the master from liability where the act would not have been done by a competent servant.[85]

§ 319. —— Concurrent Negligence of Competent Fellow Servant

The fact that a competent fellow servant was also negligent does not necessarily relieve the master of liability for an injury which would not have happened without the negligence of an incompetent servant.

A master is not relieved from liability for injuries which would not have happened but for the negligence of an incompetent servant, of whose incompetency he had actual or constructive notice by reason of the fact that a competent fellow servant was also negligent.[86]

§ 320. Supervision

The master has the duty to provide for such general supervision or direction with respect to his servants as will render the conduct of his business reasonably safe for them, and such duty is nondelegable.

The master may without the employment of a superintendent personally supervise the work in which his servants are engaged, if he is himself competent,[87] but he must either himself or through a vice principal exercise such general supervision or direction over his servants as will render the conduct of his business reasonably safe for them.[88] This duty of general supervision is nondelegable,[89] as is, in some jurisdictions, the duty of superintendence of the particular work in hand.[90]

Otherwise stated

Particular instances

United Gas Public Service Co., 168 So. 462, 176 Miss. 282.

2. Common-Law Liability of Master for Injuries by Fellow Servant

§ 321. In General

The general rule at common law is that a master is not liable for injuries to his servant caused by the negligence of a fellow servant. The rule ordinarily is based on public policy, or on the doctrine of assumption of risk, but has been said to be unpopular with the courts.

Unless the parties have made an express contract to the contrary,[97] the general rule at common law and in the absence of statute otherwise providing is that a master is not liable to one servant for injuries caused by the negligence of a fellow servant.[98] This doctrine, commonly referred to as the

Where an employee who was engaged in stacking mine timber at the foot of a hill was injured by a timber which was slid down the hill by another employee who was engaged with others farther up in cutting, splitting, and sliding down timber, the master was not liable, in view of the facts that he had previously given due instructions as to warning before sliding timber and the like and that just prior to the injury he had merely ordered a fellow servant to slide timber nearer to the stack below.—Owens v. "fellow-servant" rule,[99] is not founded in abstract or natural justice,[1] and is an exception to the ordinary rule of agency[2] and to the general rule that a master is responsible for injury caused to a third person by any negligence or misconduct of his servants while acting within the scope of their employment.[3]

The most usual ground assigned for the fellow-servant doctrine is that the negligence of a fellow servant is one of the risks incident to the employment and is assumed by the servant;[4] this, it is said, is an implied term of the contract of employment.[5] Public policy is also frequently asserted to be the true basis of the fellow-servant doctrine, on the theory that it is calculated to make servants in a common employment watchful of each other and thereby to promote carefulness in the performance of their duties.[6] Thus, it has been said, it provides for the safety and welfare of the public while it works no injury to the servant, since his entry on the service is voluntary, with a knowledge of its hazards and with the power and right to demand such wages as he shall deem compensatory.[7] The rule does not rest on the ground that the negligence of the coemployee is imputed to the servant[8] but on the ground that it is not imputed to the master.[9]

It has been said that the fellow-servant rule is not a popular one with the courts,[10] and that the courts have refused to make it the basis for defeating recovery for an injured workman except in

Historical development

(1) This rule as to the nonliability of the master for the negligence of a coemployee was announced in comparatively early English decisions, the most widely cited of which was decided in 1837.—Priestly v. Fowler, 3 M. & W. 1, 150 Reprint 1030.

(2) The rule was announced in the United States in South Carolina in 1841.—Murray v. South Carolina R. Co., 26 S.C.L. 385, 400, 36 Am.D. 268—39 C.J. p. 540 note 22.

(3) In 1842 the rule of these two decisions was adopted and amplified by the supreme court of Massachusetts, in an opinion written by Chief Justice Shaw, and because of the great learning and ability displayed by the justice this decision has taken rank as the leading American decision on the fellow-servant doctrine.—Farwell v. Boston & W. R. Corp., 4 Metc. (Mass.) 49, 38 Am.D. 339.

(2) However, in an instruction given in a particular case the court spoke of the acts of fellow servants of plaintiff as constituting contributory negligence.—Stevenson v. Chicago & A. R. Co., C.C.Mo., 18 F. 493, 5 McCrary 634.

those cases in which it is so plainly applicable that there seems no escape unless the doctrine is to be entirely abrogated;[11] and it has also been judicially observed that distinctions have been recognized in the relations of the employees of a common master which tend to soften the rigor of the rule as it was originally formulated by the courts.[12]

Civil law. The fellow-servant rule generally is not recognized as a doctrine of the civil law.[13]

§ 322. Extent and Applicability of Rule

a. In general
b. Persons subject

a. In General

The fellow-servant rule does not apply where the tortious act is that of the master or of a coemployee who is not a fellow servant; nor does it apply where the act of a fellow servant is not the proximate cause of the injury.

The fellow-servant rule has been applied to relieve the master from liability in a wide variety of cases;[14] application of the rule, in the final analysis, is wholly dependent on the facts and circumstances in the particular case.[15] The fellow-servant rule is not involved where the act complained of is that of the master and not that of a fellow servant,[16] nor does it apply where the act of an alleged fellow servant is not shown to have been the proximate cause of the injury[17] or where the proximate cause of the injury is the default of the master in respect of a primary or nondelegable duty.[18]

The servant does not assume the risk of injuries from coemployees who are not fellow servants,[19] since this is not regarded as a risk ordinarily incident to the employment,[20] and their negligence will be imputed to the master.[21] Also he will not be held to have assumed the risk of the acts of a negligent person who is at the time acting as the master's representative[22] or agent,[23] or who is in the status of a vice principal, as discussed infra § 332c; and in jurisdictions recognizing the superior-servant rule, discussed infra § 332 e (1), an employee does not assume the risk of the negligence of a superior servant.

The fellow-servant rule ordinarily absolves the employer from liability to an employee for inju-

Tort or contract
In an action by an employee who was injured while being transported to his place of work by one who had entered into a contract of transportation with the employer, it was held that a defense of fellow-servant rule, if established, would bar recovery whether the action was in tort or for breach of implied contract to furnish safe transportation.—Pittsburgh Valve Foundry & Construction Co. v. Gallagher, C.C.A.Ohio, 32 F.2d 436.

Mere commitment of force to servant, such as operation of piece of machinery, does not render employer liable for negligence of employee in using such power or force to injury of a fellow servant.—Burge v. American Car & Foundry Co., Mo.App., 274 S.W. 842.

Throwing lighted match
Employer was not liable under common law for injuries sustained by employee while painting inside of tank, as result of fellow servant's negligence in throwing lighted match to bottom of tank, igniting paint or fumes.—Baughman v. Pitchfork Land & Cattle Co., C.C.A.Tex., 86 F.2d 778.

Pulling stumps
A tenant cultivating farm on shares could not recover from landlord for injury received while pulling stumps, even if master-servant relation existed, where injury was caused by negligence of landlord's employee operating tractor, in absence of evidence that landlord hired or retained employee with knowledge of employee's incompetency.—Pleasants v. ries occasioned by the negligence, as distinguished from the incompetence, of another employee;[24] but, as considered infra § 325, the rule is sometimes available to relieve the employer of liability for willful acts committed by an employee. The master is not liable for injuries caused to one of his servants by acts or omissions of another servant which are not shown to have been negligent or tortious.[25]

Statutory duty. The fellow-servant rule does not apply where the proximate cause of the injury is the violation of a statutory duty imposed on the master.[26] The servant does not assume the risk of neglect by a fellow servant of a duty imposed by statute[27] unless the danger is obvious.[28]

Prior negligence. The servant on entering the employment ordinarily takes the risk of any existing negligence of his fellow servant as well as of that which may thereafter occur,[29] and the fact that the negligence complained of antedates the injury does not preclude the application of the fellow-servant doctrine.[30]

Damage to servant's property. It has been held that the fellow-servant rule does not absolve a master for the act of a servant in negligently damaging the property, rather than injuring the person, of a fellow servant.[31]

Employment on Sunday. The rule that a master is not liable for an injury caused to his servant by a fellow servant is in no way affected by the fact that both servants at the time of the accident were illegally employed on Sunday.[32]

b. Persons Subject

The fellow-servant rule may be applicable to employees of a corporation or of the government; but it has been held inapplicable to persons in compulsory service and also to minors unlawfully employed or unable to appreciate the dangers of the employment.

Servants who do not come within the letter of the fellow-servant rule are not bound by its consequences.[33]

Minors. The fact that the servant who sustains the injuries which constitute the ground of complaint is a minor ordinarily will not prevent the application of the fellow-servant doctrine[34] if he has sufficient capacity to take care of himself and knows and can properly appreciate the risk.[35] The doctrine does not, however, apply if by reason of his tender years the employee is incapable of appreciating the dangers and hazards of his employment.[36] Further, where a minor is employed in violation of a statute, the negligence of a fellow servant is no defense against his recovery from the master for injuries resulting therefrom.[37]

Persons in compulsory service. The fellow-servant doctrine does not apply to persons in compulsory service.[38]

the absence of statute, the rule that a master is not liable to a servant for injuries caused by the negligence of a fellow servant, where the master himself is not at fault, is applicable to corporations as well as to individuals employing servants.[39] The rule has been applied to the employees of a municipal corporation[40] or of a state.[41] However, persons who are not city employees, but governmental agents of the state performing duties of a public character for the benefit of all citizens of the community, have been held not to be fellow servants.[42]

Employees on vessels. The fellow-servant rule applies in the case of seamen and other employees on vessels,[43] and, where the status of fellow servant exists, at the common law such an employee cannot hold his employer responsible for an injury caused by the negligence of a coemployee,[44] nor can he recover under the maritime law unless the vessel is unseaworthy as to him.[45]

§ 323. —— Scope of Employment

a. Of servant injured
b. Of servant occasioning injury

a. Of Servant Injured

The fellow-servant rule applies to a servant injured while acting within the scope of his employment although outside the line of his regular duties.

The rule exempting the master from liability for injuries to a servant due to the negligence of a fellow servant, when under the facts and circumstances it is otherwise applicable, may apply although the injuries were received by the servant while acting outside the line of his regular duties.[46] However, the fellow-servant rule applies only where the servant was injured while acting within the scope of his employment or in connection therewith,[47] and has no application to one who, although in the employment of the principal whose servant's negligence occasions the injury, is not, when injured, engaged in the performance of his duties as such employee, but has left the scene of his labors and is engaged in the pursuit of his own ends.[48] Further, if a servant, although acting outside the line of his regular employment, is engaged in the master's service and with his assent or the assent of one having implied authority to accept his services, the master may be liable for the negligence of a coemployee as to a nondelegable duty of the master.[49]

Overtime work. The fellow-servant rule may apply although the employee is working overtime if in the line of his employment.[50]

b. Of Servant Occasioning Injury

The fact that an employee could have prevented injury to another employee by going outside his duties does not enable the employer to rely on the fellow-servant rule. The master is not liable for injuries to one employee caused by another employee who is not acting within the scope of his employment, but rather in a private affair of his own.

The negligence which will relieve the master from liability is an omission by the fellow servant to perform some act which is his duty to perform, or the doing of some act, in the course of his duties, in such a negligent manner as to cause the injury,[51] and the master cannot invoke the fellow-servant rule so as to escape liability by claiming that a fellow servant of the injured employee could have prevented the injury by going outside his regular duties and acting without authority or direction.[52]

servant by the act of a coemployee rests on an application of the doctrine of respondeat superior.[53] A master cannot be held liable for injuries to his servant caused by an alleged agent or coemployee of the master where it does not appear that the party causing the injury was in fact the master's agent or employee,[54] and in determining the existence of such relationship each case must stand or fall on its own particular facts, in the light of all the surrounding circumstances.[55] Further, in order to impose liability on the master for injuries caused to one employee by a coemployee, the act or omission of the coemployee must have been within the scope of his employment;[56] and if a servant commits a negligent act, whereby another is injured, in the prosecution of an affair wholly his own and not in the furtherance of the master's business, even if the turning aside from the master's service is only for the instant, if it is complete the relation of master and servant does not exist and the master is not liable for the injuries so caused.[57] However, if the act of the coemployee is committed in the course of his employment, although unauthorized or even forbidden by the master, the master may be liable.[58] Although a negligent act of the servant may not be within the scope of his authority, the circumstances may be such as to render the master negligent in failing to restrain the servant from doing the act while within his control.[59]

Joint employers. Where a servant is employed by two employers jointly, they may be jointly and severally liable for his wrongful act.[60]

§ 324. —— Incompetent Fellow Servants

The competency of fellow servants is considered generally supra §§ 311–319, and the extent to which a recovery based on the incompetency of fellow servants may be affected by the doctrine of assumption of risk infra §§ 357–420.

§ 325. —— Gross Negligence, and Willful, Malicious, or Reckless Acts of Fellow Servants

a. In general
b. Willful, malicious, or reckless acts

a. In General

It has generally been held, under the fellow-servant rule, that the employee can have no recovery although his fellow servants may have been guilty of gross negligence.[61] However, there is authority holding the master liable for an injury to a subordinate employee caused by the gross negligence of a superior employee[62] although the master would not have been liable for ordinary negligence.[63] What, in a given case, will constitute willful or gross negligence necessarily depends on the peculiar facts and circumstances.[64]

b. Willful, Malicious, or Reckless Acts

Misconduct of an employee may fall within the scope of the fellow-servant rule; but in cases in which the rule is inapplicable the master may be liable for reckless or malicious acts of an employee, committed in furtherance of the master's business, whereby another employee is injured.

It has been judicially observed that, although the fellow-servant rule is generally stated in terms of negligence only, misconduct of a coemployee is also within its scope.[65] In cases not falling within the application of the fellow-servant rule, the master may be liable to an employee for a wrong done by a coemployee in performing the master's business with a wanton or reckless purpose to accomplish it in an unlawful manner,[66] and the master under this rule may be liable for the malicious act of the coemployee[67] or for his reckless act.[68] When the willful act is committed outside the scope of the offending servant's employment, the master is plainly not liable.[69]

Sportive acts. The master is not liable for an injury occasioned by sportive acts or horseplay not in the scope and course of the employment.[70]

Assault. Under the operation of the fellow-servant rule, where the master has not been negligent in employing a quarrelsome or incompetent servant or retaining him in his employment after knowledge of his dangerous character, he is not liable for an assault made by the employee on a fellow servant[71] although the assault and the quarrel from which it arose occurred in the prosecution of the master's business.[72] In cases to which the fellow-servant rule is not applicable the master may be liable for an assault committed by an employee without regard to his negligence in employing and retaining him,[73] provided, however, the guilty servant is acting within the course of his employment.[74] The master is not liable for an assault by one servant on the other where the act of the guilty servant is outside the scope of his employment[75] or when neither was acting within the course of his employment;[76] and in any case where the assault is merely a wanton and willful act done to satisfy the temper or spite of the employee the master is not liable.[77] Clearly an employer is not liable to an employee for an assault committed by another employee if the assault was not wrongfully made;[78] but the fact that an employee may be authorized under the circumstances to use a reasonable degree of force to compel obedience to his orders does not absolve the master of responsibility for the employee's negligence in using unreasonable force.[79]

§ 326. What Law Governs

The law of the place where the cause of action arose generally determines the applicability of the fellow-servant rule, provided such law does not violate the public policy of the law of the forum.

In accordance with the general rule adopted as to the law governing an action for tort, discussed in Conflict of Laws § 12 a, in an action for injury to a servant the application of the rule as to fellow servants is ordinarily held to depend on the law of the place where the cause of action arose and not on the law of the forum,[80] provided, however, such law does not conflict with the public policy of the latter state.[81] However, in a jurisdiction where the servant is not allowed to recover for an injury sustained through the negligence of the fellow servant, it has been held that a statute of a foreign state where the injury occurred, imposing liability on the employer in such cases, will not be recognized to afford the employee a greater remedy than he would have under the law of the forum.[82]

§ 327. Who Are Fellow Servants

a. In general
b. Riding in master's conveyance
c. Particular employments

a. In General

While there is no general definition of fellow servants which will apply in all jurisdictions, in general fellow servants are those serving a common master, working under the same control, deriving authority and compensation from the same source, and engaged in the same general business.

It has frequently been stated that all serving a common master working under the same control, deriving authority and compensation from the same source, and engaged in the same general business, although in different grades or departments, are fellow servants.[83] More briefly, it is sometimes stated that all persons are,[84] at least prima facie,[85] fellow servants who are in the common service of, master."—Lykes Bros. S. S. Co. v. Grubaugh, C.C.A.Tex., 128 F.2d 387, 391, modified on other grounds 130 F.2d 25.

Gratuitous interference in personal altercation

A caddie could not recover from a club for an assault by employee of club on theory that employee committed assault in course of his employment and in furtherance of club's business, where assault occurred as an incident to a gratuitous interference by employee with a purely personal altercation between caddie and another employee, neither of whom was subject to control of employee committing assault.—Country Club of Jackson v. Turner, 4 So. 2d 718, 192 Miss. 510.

Fear of assault

Employee could not recover from employer for injuries sustained in dodging a person he feared was about to assault him, on ground that earlier assaults produced mental state rendering such act involuntary and mere injurious consequence of preëxisting cause of action, where plaintiff testified that the previous assaults did not impair his general health, and there was no evidence that they had any continuing effect.—Dewing v. and controlled by, a common master. It is not necessary that they be hired or discharged by the same superior agent of the master,[86] or that they be employed for the same time,[87] or that the amount[88] or manner and time of payment[89] of wages be the same; and in contemplation of law one may be a fellow servant without having been actually employed by the master himself.[90]

There is no fixed rule, however, by which to determine under what circumstances workmen are fellow servants,[91] and it has been said to be impossible to reconcile the definitions of the different courts as to who are fellow servants.[92] Particularly is it impossible to lay down a general rule for the determination of who are or who are not fellow servants which will be applicable in all jurisdictions,[93] for consideration must be given to the prevalence in the particular jurisdiction of the "superior-servant" rule, discussed infra § 332 e, the "different-department" rule, discussed infra § 331 b, the "consociation" rule, discussed infra § 331 c, and the effect of the character of the act involved as fixing the status of the employees, discussed infra § 333. Thus in the final analysis the question must be determined with regard to the circumstances of the particular case.[94]

b. Riding in Master's Conveyance

The determination of whether those riding in the master's conveyance are fellow servants depends, as a rule, on whether the employer in furnishing the transportation, and the employees in using it, are engaged in performing the duties of the employment.

In determining whether the fellow-servant rule is applicable in a given case of injury to a person while riding to or from his work in his employer's conveyance, it has been said that the test is whether the employer in furnishing the transportation, and the employee in using it, were engaged in performing one of the express or implied duties of the employment.[95] The mere fact that one is employed by the master in whose conveyance he is riding does not make him a fellow servant with the driver or operator of such conveyance if he is at such time not on duty and the transportation from place to place is no part of the service he had contracted to render; in other words, if he is acting as a member of the general public, he is a passenger, notwithstanding he may be transported free.[96] On the other hand, the general rule is that employees who are being carried as a part of their contract of service to and from their places of work are, subject to the rules recognized in the particular jurisdiction as to the existence of the relation, fellow servants of other employees, and not passengers.[97] There need not be an express agreement for such carriage,[98] nor is it necessary that the employee ride upon a particular conveyance;[99] and the rule does not cease to apply by reason of the mere fact that the carriage is had after the day's work has ceased.[1]

The fellow-servant rule has been held not to apply where the duty to transport employees is one which the master has impliedly contracted to perform in person, and the duty is performed by another under authority of, and as agent for, the master, and for whose negligent act the master is liable as though he were present personally and himself breached the duty;[2] and it has also been held that where a servant in obeying the orders of his master, and without negligence on his part, is injured by the negligent operation of the master's automobile by another servant of the master, and the injured servant is not permitted to participate in, or direct the operation of, and has no control over, the injuring instrumentality or the operator thereof, the master is liable if the negligent servant was acting within the scope of his employment when the injury was sustained.[3]

Employees operating trains have frequently been held fellow servants of track employees injured by the negligence of the former;[7] and this rule has been applied, inter alia, to track inspectors,[8] bridge gangs,[9] and a car repairer or inspector injured by the negligence of trainmen.[10]

Employees who are injured while merely riding upon a train are ordinarily fellow servants of the train crew[11] although there is some authority to the contrary on the ground that the employees are regarded as engaged on different pieces of work.[12]

Trainmen working on different trains for the same railroad company are generally held fellow servants[13] although it has also been held that they are not in common employment.[14] Likewise employees on different cars of a street railroad have been held fellow servants.[15]

(b) Particular Employees

A brakeman, conductor, engineer, fireman, yard employee, or switchman may, depending on the circumstances, be a fellow servant of other railroad employees.

Subject to the qualifications and limitations on the fellow-servant rule recognized in the particular jurisdiction, an employee whose work is connected with railroad yards generally cannot recover for injuries received from the negligence of train or other employees using the yards, since they are fellow servants.[16] Members of the same[17] or different[18] switching crews may be fellow servants, and the same rule applies to employees on a switch or other engine whose negligence was the cause of injury to car employees or switchmen.[19] A hostler may be a fellow servant of a yard helper injured by the negligence of the former.[20] The negligence of a switch tender, where the master has used due care in employing a competent person for the position, resulting in injuries to other employees, is generally held the negligence of a fellow servant.[21]

Brakeman has been held a fellow servant of a conductor injured by the negligence of the former;[22] and brakemen on the same train have been held fellow servants of each other,[23] although the negligent brakeman was at the time the acting conductor.[24] A brakeman may be a fellow servant of laborers on a construction train[25] or of an employee charged with the duty of placing sand in the sand boxes of the locomotive.[26]

Conductor of one train has been held the fellow servant of other employees who are working on another train,[27] such as a fireman,[28] brakeman,[29] baggage master,[30] or a laborer on a work train;[31] and a conductor has also been held to be the fellow servant of the engineer on another train,[32] although as to this the contrary has also been held.[33]

Engineer. A railroad engineer has often been held a fellow servant of other members of the train crew injured by his negligence,[34] such as the fireman[35] and brakeman.[36] An engineer in charge of a switch engine is a fellow servant of a switch conductor[37] or a member of the switching crew.[38] The engineer in charge of a construction train may be a fellow servant of laborers connected therewith who are injured through his negligence.[39] An engineer has also been held a fellow servant of an injured engine cleaner[40] or other yard workman.[41] However, an engineer has been held not a fellow servant of a common laborer engaged in unloading material from a car located at some distance from the engine, where the individuals were engaged in different operations and different elements of railroading.[42]

An engineer whose negligence causes the injury may be a fellow servant of employees on another train,[43] such as the engineer,[44] the fireman,[45] the brakeman,[46] or a laborer on a work train.[47]

Fireman may be a fellow servant of a brakeman,[48] a trackman,[49] or a switch tender.[50] A student fireman has been held a fellow servant with the regular train crew.[51]

(2) Shipping

Members of the crew of a ship, or employees working on or about the ship, may be fellow servants with respect to each other.

Subject to the qualifications and limitations on the fellow-servant rule recognized in the particular jurisdiction, all the members of the crew or employees working on or about the ship are generally fellow servants.[52] The members of a stevedore's crew ordinarily are fellow servants;[53] but those loading a vessel at one port are not fellow servants of those who unload it some time later at a distant port.[54] Stevedores and longshoremen employed by the ship are fellow servants of the members of the crew where all are engaged in the common work of loading or unloading,[55] but not, it seems, where the crew members had nothing to do with the loading or unloading.[56] A longshoreman unloading cargo from a lighter, who is employed by the hour and is not a member of the crew, is not a fellow servant of the captain of the lighter.[57]

(3) Other Employments

The general rules governing the existence of the fellow-servant relationship have been applied to employees engaged in mining, quarrying, operating an elevator, or erecting a building.

Subject to the qualifications and limitations on the fellow-servant rule recognized in the particular jurisdiction, an elevator operator has been held to be a fellow servant of other employees working in and about the building.[58] Also, subject to such

§ 328. —— Existence of Relation of Master and Servant in General

a. In general
b. Volunteers and emergency servants

a. In General

The defense of fellow servant does not apply unless the injured and offending persons were at the time of the injury servants of the person sought to be charged.

The defense of fellow servant can be availed of only where both the person injured and the person whose act or neglect caused the injury stood at the time of the injury in the relation of servant and master to the person or corporation sought to be charged;[61] and the negligence of a coemployee of the injured person is not a defense in an action against one who was not at the time the master of the injured person.[62] Thus the fellow-servant rule does not apply where the injured person was at the time no longer in the employ of the master although it was because of his previous service that he happened to be at the place where he was injured[63] or although the injury was the alleged proximate result of an act of negligence occurring during the common employment.[64]

Persons acting in place of servant. Where one servant acts in the place of, or as a substitute for, another, he stands in the same relation to the other servants of the master as the servant in whose place he is acting; if the latter is a fellow servant, he is a fellow servant,[65] and vice versa.[66]

Student employees. The fellow-servant rule is applicable as between the regular employees of the master and student employees who are under his control preparing themselves for his service and performing parts thereof as they acquire knowledge of the details thereof, although they may not receive wages.[67]

b. Volunteers and Emergency Servants

A volunteer or emergency servant may be a fellow servant within the meaning of the fellow-servant rule; but one who in furtherance of his own interests assists

Injury to employee's wife

The fellow-servant rule does not apply where the action is brought against the master by an employee for an injury to his wife occasioned by the negligence of another employee.—Campbell v. Harris, 23 S.W. 35, 4 Tex.Civ.App. 636.

Stranger

Excusing of the master for the negligence of a fellow servant is based on contract, and is personal to the master; and a stranger, whose negligence, combined with the negligence of a servant, injures a fellow servant, is not entitled to the benefits of the contract between the master and servant, but the two are liable as joint tort-feasors for their negligent acts.—East Ohio Gas Co. v. O'Hara, 17 Ohio App. 352.

Domestic worker held not independent contractor

In action by woman engaged to do the laundry and to close a summer home for personal injuries sustained through negligence of owner's servants, where plaintiff had no established place of business and did domestic work for different employers and used the tools and materials of the employers, and was paid by the hour, and performed the same general task as defendant's servants, plaintiff was not an independent contractor, but was a servant, and hence was barred of recovery under the fellow-servant rule.—Bell v. the servants of another in their work has been held not to become thereby a fellow servant of the others.

One who, having no interest in the work, voluntarily assists the servant of another, whether or not at the request of such servant, and is injured by the negligence or misconduct of such servant, stands in the position of a fellow servant with such employee and cannot recover from the master, since he can impose no greater liability on the master than a hired servant;[68] the master owes to him no higher duty than to a trespasser, and is liable, if at all, only for his own or his servant's willful or wanton negligence;[69] and for injuries received by a servant from the negligence or fault of a volunteer the master is not liable where he was in no wise responsible for the presence or acts of such volunteer.[70]

Emergency servants. An emergency or pressing necessity which makes impossible, without further assistance, the full performance of a servant's work may of itself arm the servant with power to employ or accept assistance immediately and essentially necessary to fulfill his task, and thereby clothe the one employed or assisting with the rights of a servant of the master, even though the one employing or accepting the assistance otherwise has no authority to employ anyone or to accept any service on behalf of the master, and even though the one so employed or assisting may recover no compensation therefor from the master.[71] A person so employed or assisting is referred to as an "emergency servant,"[72] and it has been held that while the emergency continues the liability of the master for an injury to him is governed by the ordinary rules as to the liability of the master for an injury to a servant caused by acts of fellow servants,[73] although it has been held to the contrary that, while he is entitled to the same protection from the master as any other servant engaged in like employment, he is not a fellow servant with those regularly engaged.[74] Where the servant who calls a stranger to assist acts as a superior or controls the emergency servant, he is charged with the master's duty to provide a safe place to work, and the master is liable for a failure thereof.[75]

In order to become an emergency servant, the person assisting must be called on because of necessity, since it is the emergency which gives rise to the implied authority, and if it does not in fact exist the implication of a servant's authority to hire him does not arise;[76] and if the servant calling on another for help can do the work himself there is no occasion of necessity to imply power in him to employ assistance.[77]

Interest in work. One who, in furtherance of his own interests, assists the servants of another in the performance of their work is not a trespasser,

Where employee was directed by employer to deliver truck load of merchandise to another town, and employee's brother accompanied employee and was killed in collision on return trip, question whether brother went along as a volunteer or whether employee agreed to pay brother for assistance was immaterial, with respect to employer's common-law liability for death, since brother's legal status with relation to employer would be that of a fellow servant in either case and recovery would be barred by fellow-servant rule.—Serano v. Emergency not shown

One employed to look after business in a distant part of state was not confronted with such emergency as would warrant employment of assistant driver without employer's knowledge so as to render employer liable for employee's injuries resulting from assistant driver's negligence, where employee could have reached place of business by railroad or, at least, without driving all night.—Powell v. because he is lawfully in his place; he is not a fellow servant with the other servants, because he is not directly or indirectly retained or employed by the master of such servants; he is not a mere volunteer, because he does the work to further his own interests or those of his master.[78] Therefore the master of such other servants is liable to him for injuries received as a result of their neglect or misconduct, and the fellow-servant rule is not applicable.[79] This is true, even though the service is not wholly voluntary, but is induced by the request of a servant in the master's employ.[80]

Although the mere fact that a servant has ceased his work does not automatically and instantly remove him from the operation of the fellow-servant rule, a servant who is not on duty, but is acting as a member of the general public, ordinarily is not considered a fellow servant of those engaged by the same master.

As a general rule a servant who is not on duty, but rather is acting in a proper way as a member of the general public, is not a fellow servant of those engaged by the same master so as to relieve the master from liability to him for injuries resulting from their negligence.[81] However, although the injured employee may have ceased work at the termination of his working hours, he may still be within the application of the fellow-servant rule while the incidents of employment continue,[82] as where he is gathering up and putting away his tools,[83] or is procuring or adjusting clothing which he has laid aside during his work,[84] or is preparing to leave the place of employment;[85] and, for the same reason, servants on their way to and from work have been held, although not actually on duty, to be fellow servants of others of the master's employees engaged in the same common employment, so as to relieve him of liability for injuries received by them through the negligence of such other employees.[86] It has been held that, where the servant of a railroad company, when not on duty, occupies a building or car furnished by the company, his relation to the other employees of the company is not changed by reason of the fact that he was not actually on duty when injured, because his presence in such place can be accounted for only by the fact that he is an employee, and not merely a member of the general public.[87]

§ 330. —— Servants of Separate Masters

a. In general
b. Servant of one master controlled by another
c. Independent contractors

a. In General

Employees, in order to be fellow servants, must be servants of a common master; and the servant of one master does not necessarily become the fellow servant of the employees of another master by the fact that, to further the interests of his own master, he assists them in their work.

Servants of separate masters, although engaged in a common undertaking, are not fellow servants.[88] In order to constitute that relation, servants must be in the employ of, or controlled by, a common master.[89] If, with a view to expediting the business or furthering the interests of his general master, the servant assists the servants of another in their work, he is not the fellow servant of those whom he is assisting,[90] although, acting under general orders from his employer to assist such servants, he does so at their request.[91]

Servants of different railroads having traffic arrangements. The fact that one railroad company uses the tracks and stations of another under contract between them does not as a rule make the employees of either company fellow servants with the employees of the other.[92]

b. Servant of One Master Controlled by Another

A servant of one master who is lent to, and becomes subject to the control of, another master is generally regarded, as far as concerns the application of the fellow-servant rule, as a servant of the master to whom he is lent.

Where one person lends his servant to another for a particular employment, the servant, for anything done in that particular employment, must be dealt with as a servant of the man to whom he is lent, although he remains the general servant of the person who lent him.[93] Thus, if the servant injures,[94] or receives injuries in such employment from the negligence of,[95] a servant of the person to whom he is lent, the fellow-servant rule may bar recovery therefor from the person to whom he is lent. Further, if any liability should arise for the negligence of such servant in the particular employment of another master, it does not attach to the general master,[96] but attaches rather to the special master.[97]

In determining whether a servant lent by one master to another has become the servant of the latter, the test ordinarily is whether, in the particular service which the lent servant is engaged to perform, he continues liable to the direction and control of his general master or becomes subject to that of the person to whom he is lent or hired.[98] Nevertheless, the servant so lent must consent to the change of master, expressly or impliedly;[99] and to bring the case within the fellow-servant rule the services rendered by the employee for the third person must be such as to create the legal relation of master and servant.[1] Actual exercise of the right to control the servant of the general employer in the service of a special master is not necessary where the special master is willing to rely on the experience and skill of the lent servant.[2] The fact that the general master pays the wages of the servant does not preclude him from becoming pro hac vice the particular servant of another.[3]

c. Independent Contractors

An employee is generally not considered a fellow servant of one engaged by his master as an independent contractor or of the servants of such contractor, although there are circumstances under which he may become their fellow servant.

Where a servant of a principal works side by side with one employed by his master as an independent contractor[4] or with a servant of such contractor,[5] or where the servant of an independent contractor works with the servant of a subcontractor,[6] they are not fellow servants even though they are engaged in a common work or act for the benefit of the same ultimate employer. Where, however, the principal has control over the employees of the contractor and power to dismiss them, such employees become fellow servants with the employees of the principal,[7] and the servant of a general master is prima facie the fellow servant of the servants of an independent contractor when his master directs him to assist the servants of such independent contractor,[8] but the fact that the independent contractor instructs his foreman to obey the orders of the general superintendent of the principal does not make his employees and those of the latter fellow servants.[9]

§ 331. —— Common Employment

a. In general
b. Different-department rule
c. Consociation doctrine

a. In General

Coemployees, in order to fall within the fellow-servant rule, must be engaged in a common employment, that is, work of the same general character or such as to bring them into necessary and frequent contact; and in determining the question of common employment consideration is sometimes given to circumstances such as exposure to or apprehension of injury from the other servants, and ability to take precautions.

In order that the relation of fellow servant may exist, the coemployees must not only be in the service of a common master, as discussed supra § 330, but must be engaged in a common employment,[10] that is, in work of the same general character.[11]

Trucker as bailor

A trucker whose truck at time of injury thereto, as result of negligence of another trucker, was being driven by substitute driver while trucker was off duty was not precluded under fellow-servant doctrine from recovering from company for the damage thereto, since trucker as bailor of the truck at time of injury was not then engaged in common employment.—Wicklund v. North Star Timber Co., 287 N.W. 7, 205 Minn. 595.

Laborer and driver of tractor

Where cane cutter with other farm laborers was transported in wagon which was hauled by motor tractor, relation of fellow servant was held not to exist between laborer and driver of tractor so as to preclude recovery for injuries sustained when laborer fell from wagon, since laborer had nothing to do with driving of tractor.—Lewis v. A. Moresi Co., La. App., 196 So. 70.

A road foreman who had control over tractors and graders when they were on the job was not a fellow servant of employee whose work was confined to greasing machinery and acting as night watchman, so as to preclude recovery for death of foreman crushed by heavy road scraper when it accidentally started while being greased by other employee.—Hill v. (2) Engagement in the same gen-

In order to be a fellow servant, an employee must be working to accomplish a result which the other employees are also working to bring about,[12] or the character of their respective occupations must be such as to bring them into habitual association or necessary and frequent contact.[13] Employees are not engaged in the same common employment where they are working separately and independently of each other, at different places, and at separate pieces of work.[14]

On the other hand, it has been held not an indispensable requisite that they be at the time engaged in the same operation or particular work,[15] or that they work at the same place[16] or time[17] or be in sight of each other,[18] or that their trades or functions be identical;[19] and those engaged in the master's service in effecting a common purpose may be deemed fellow servants although the work is done in successive stages, different parts thereof being done by different persons, and the labor performed by one set of employees being prior in time to that performed by another set.[20]

Exposure to, or apprehension of, injury. It has been stated that in order to be fellow servants it must appear that the individuals are employed by the same master to accomplish one common object and are so related in their labors and services as ordinarily to be exposed to injury caused by each other's negligence.[21] It has been held that the employee must know that he is exposed to the risk of being injured by the negligence of another[22] or should know it by the exercise of ordinary sagacity,[23] and that it must appear that the injured servant can be said to have apprehended the possibility of injury from another servant while engaged in the service for which he is hired.[24]

Ability to take precautions. In determining the existence of a fellow-servant relationship, consideration is sometimes given to the questions whether the individuals involved are so associated in their work that they can observe and have an influence over each other's conduct promotive of proper caution[25] and can also report delinquencies to a common power or head,[26] and whether they are so far working together as to be practically coöperating and to have opportunity to control or influence the conduct of each other and have no superiority of the one over the other.[27] Employees are not engaged in the same common employment, according to the view expressed by some authorities, where they have no opportunity to use precautions against each other's negligence.[28]

Control. Tests laid down as to the existence of a fellow servant relationship sometimes include the element of control over the employees, and some courts in determining the existence of such relationship have given consideration to the circumstance of whether the individuals are engaged in the same common service under the same general control,[29] whether they are working together under one common directing superior,[30] whether they are engaged in the same work, under one common control, for the same general purpose, and to accomplish one common result,[31] or whether they are in the same common service of master in conducting and carrying on the same general business, and neither is in any sense under the control or direction of the other.[32]

b. Different-Department Rule

(1) In general
(2) What constitutes a department

(1) In General

Under the different-department rule, which prevails in some jurisdictions, an employee engaged in one department of his employer's business is not deemed the fellow servant of an employee engaged in another department unless they are brought into necessary and frequent contact or are actually coöperating at the time of the injury.

In some jurisdictions those who are employed by a common master but who are not engaged in the same work or in the same department of service are not fellow servants.[33] This rule has met with frequent application in the case of railroad employees,[34] mine employees,[35] and employees engaged in logging operations,[36] building and construction work,[37] or in other particular industries or employments.[38] This rule, known as the "different-department rule," has been expressly or impliedly repudiated in a number of states,[39] at least in cases other than those wherein the departments are so far separated from each other as to exclude the possibility of contact and danger from the negligent performance of their duties by employees of the different departments.[40] Since the basis of the departmental rule, both in its general statement and as defined by the consociation doctrine, discussed infra subdivision c of this section, is the ordinary danger to one servant from the negligence of another servant, and his opportunity to guard against that danger by exercising and promoting caution, it is apparent that the relation of fellow servant exists where the character of their respective occupations bring the people engaged in them into necessary and frequent contact, even if they have no personal relation;[41] and obviously servants who are actually coöperating, or who are performing duties permitting the exercise of influence over each other, are fellow servants although employed in different departments.[42] In the absence of statute, the doctrine of different departments is not limited to cases involving railroad employees, and applies wherever the reason for the rule exists.[43]

(2) What Constitutes a Department

The nature of the employer's business ordinarily determines whether servants are employed in different departments thereof, consideration being given, among other things, to whether they are habitually associated in their duties and are under the same superior.

In general, whether servants are in the same or different departments of the master's business depends not on theory, or on any artificial division, but on the nature of the business itself.[44] The question of identity of department is to be determined by inquiring, among other things, whether the employees in question are habitually associated or brought together in the performance of their duties, whether they are under the immediate direction and control of the same superior, and whether the duties of one have any relation to, or connection with, those of the other,[45] so that the safety of the one must in the natural course of things depend on the care and skill of the other.[46] In order to form an exception to the general rule of the master's nonliability, the person whose neglect caused the injury must be one engaged in an essentially distinct department, and not in a mere separate piece of work in one of the branches of service within a department.[47] The difficulty of applying the department rule has been one of the chief reasons for the disfavor in which it is held, since it is nowhere stated what constitutes a department.[48] It has been held that there is no room for applying the rule where only a few servants are employed, and they are so closely associated, and the area of operations is so circumscribed or so compact, that only one superintendent over all is required.[49]

c. Consociation Doctrine

Under the consociation doctrine, only those employees are fellow servants who are brought into habitual association by their duties or who are directly coöperating at the time of the injury in the particular business in hand, although personal acquaintanceship or the length of time they have worked together is immaterial.

Apparently as a further definition of the different-department rule, there has been evolved the so-called "consociation doctrine," under which those only are fellow servants who are directly coöperating at the time of the injury in the particular business in hand, or whose usual duties are of a nature to bring them into habitual association, so that they may exercise an influence on each other promotive of proper caution.[50] This doctrine has been applied in the case of railroad employees,[51] employees engaged in mining or quarrying,[52] and in other employments.[53] Direct coöperation in a particular business or task is to be distinguished from indirect coöperation, or coöperation in the general business of the master.[54] The basis of the doctrine is that, where servants are habitually consociated in their daily duties, they may well be supposed to have an influence over one another, and a power to promote in one another caution by counsel, exhortation, and example, equal to or greater than the power of the master; but unless either their duties are such that they usually bring about personal association between such servants or they are actually coöperating at the time of the injury in the business at hand they have generally no power to incite caution in one another, and the reason for the fellow-servant doctrine is gone.[55] The relation of fellow servant does not depend on personal acquaintance[56] or actual previous association between the servants,[57] and is not prevented from arising by the fact that one or both of them were only temporarily engaged at a particular task at the time of the injury.[58] The length of time they have worked together[59] or the nature of their previous employment[60] is immaterial. Likewise the fact that servants have previously coöperated or worked in association will not constitute them fellow servants if they have been separated, so that they are no longer engaged in the same department or task or in habitual association.[61] The consociation test has been expressly or impliedly repudiated in several jurisdictions.[62]

a. In general
b. Scope of authority in general
c. Vice principals
d. General managers or heads of departments
e. Superior-servant rule
f. Dual-capacity doctrine

a. In General

Mere superiority in the grade or rank of employment does not necessarily prevent the superior employee from being the fellow servant of an inferior employee of the same master, particularly with respect to the application of the fellow-servant rule in the case of injury to a supervisory employee.

Generally speaking a mere superiority in the grade or rank of employment does not prevent the employee of superior grade from sustaining the relation of fellow servant to other employees of the same master.[63]

Injury to servant authorized to direct, supervise, or manage. As a rule, employees subject to the control, management, or supervision of another employee are his fellow servants in so far as the responsibility of the master to him for their acts is concerned,[64] and the master is not liable for an injury to the superior resulting from the negligence of his subordinates.[65] However, it has been held that a superior servant who also performs duties of an inferior nature is, while acting in the latter capacity, entitled to the rights pertaining to such capacity.[66] Further, where a superior servant is injured by the negligence of an inferior one, the injured party may recover if the act of the inferior servant is the act of the master.[67]

b. Scope of Authority in General

The master ordinarily is not liable for injuries to an employee caused by tortious acts of a superior employee committed outside the scope of his employment, although the master is not necessarily relieved of liability by the mere fact that a superior acted recklessly or in violation of the master's rules.

Generally the master is not liable for acts of an employee authorized to direct, supervise, or manage other employees where such acts are outside the scope of the authority conferred.[68] This includes negligence[69] and also willful torts.[70] However, the master has been held liable for a willful tort committed by an employee in authority where such tort was connected with the exercise of the authority conferred,[71] and it has been held that the mere fact that the superior servant acted recklessly in the exercise of his duties[72] or violated rules of the master[73] does not necessarily relieve the latter from liability. With respect to the scope of employment of a vice principal for whose acts or omissions the master may be held liable to an employee, it has been held that he is authorized to do anything which is fairly and reasonably regarded as incidental to the work specifically directed, or which is usually done in connection with such work;[74] and it has also been held that in this respect the scope of employment may include acts which as between master and servant the servant is not privileged to do.[75]

c. Vice Principals

(1) In general
(2) Who are vice principals

(1) In General

The master cannot invoke the fellow-servant rule to escape liability for injuries to his servant where the offending servant was a vice principal.

The doctrine of vice-principalship is a qualification of the fellow-servant doctrine,[76] and under it, where the negligence is that of an employee who is regarded as a vice principal, while acting as such, the master cannot invoke the fellow-servant rule to escape liability.[77]

(2) Who Are Vice Principals

The term "vice principal" has been variously applied to employees performing the personal or nondelegable duties of the master, or to those occupying a position of control or authority; but the status of vice principal does not necessarily depend on the title given to the employee or on whether he possesses power to hire and discharge other employees.

Some authorities apply the term "vice principal" to an employee who performs the personal or nondelegable duties of the master.[78] However, in a jurisdiction adhering to the superior-servant rule the question whether an employee has been placed in a position of control or authority, rather than the nature or character of the act, has been held the controlling and governing test as to whether he is vice principal or a fellow servant,[79] and thus it has been laid down that, where the master gives to a person power to superintend, control, and direct the men engaged in the performance of work, such person is as to the men under him a vice principal.[80] One who directs workmen as to how and in what manner their duties shall be discharged, supervises them while they are discharging these duties, and keeps their time may be a vice principal although he assists at times in the actual performance of the work.[81]

To put the mere details of the work under one man does not make him a vice principal over the others;[82] nor is the fact that one is called a superintendent, boss, or foreman controlling in the determination of whether he is a vice principal.[83] It has been asserted that, in order to constitute one a vice principal, the master must have committed to him the substantial control of the business, or a branch of it, and the power to do all acts necessary to its conduct.[84] Where the employer himself assumes control and gives an express order not only what to do but how to do it, a vice principal becomes for the time being a mere coemployee, whatever his general authority under other circumstances.[85] In the final analysis, the application of the doctrine of vice principal,[86] as, for example, accord-

Power to hire and discharge. The general rule is that the determination of whether a servant is a vice principal does not depend on whether the authority to hire and discharge exists;[90] thus the existence of such authority does not of itself make a servant a vice principal[91] except with respect to the discharge of the nondelegable duty of selecting competent and careful servants,[92] while, on the other hand, a servant may be a vice principal although he has no power to hire and discharge.[93] In some cases it has been held that the determination of the question depends on whether or not those who act under orders have just reason for believing that the failure or refusal to obey the superior will be followed by a discharge from the service in which they are engaged.[94]

The authority to hire and discharge is, however, frequently mentioned as a circumstance worthy of consideration in determining whether a servant because of his rank and authority to manage and control is a vice principal.[95] Further, there is some authority holding, in so far as the rule has not been modified by statute, that a superior servant is not a vice principal unless he has the authority to hire and discharge the injured servant,[96] except in so far as the liability is based on the performance of a nondelegable duty of the master,[97] although the mere fact that the right to hire and discharge is subject to the approval of another does not prevent the superior servant from being a vice principal.[98]

Necessity for actual authority. In the absence of actual authority, express or implied, a fellow servant does not merely by the assumption of authority become a vice principal.[99]

Employee temporarily vested with authority. An employee who is temporarily occupying the position of one who is a vice principal is for the time being himself a vice principal.[1] However, the master is not liable unless, at the time of the injury, the substitute was invested with the powers conferred on the vice principal whose place he has taken.[2]

d. General Managers or Heads of Departments

(1) In general
(2) What constitutes separate department or branch

(1) In General

A general manager of the employer's business, or a person charged with the entire management and supervision of a distinct department or branch thereof, is generally held not to be a fellow servant of employees under him.

Although there are decisions which have apparently repudiated or failed to recognize the rule,[6] there is authority for the view that an employee intrusted with the entire management and supervision of the business of the master,[7] or with the entire management and supervision of a distinct department or branch of the business,[8] is a vice principal and not a fellow servant of other employees. In order to bring a case within the foregoing rules the master must have committed the virtual and substantial control of the business to his representative,[9] and one who is subject to superior authority in carrying on the work is not a vice principal.[10] The nonresidence of the master does not of itself make a foreman a vice principal.[11]

Extent of liability generally. While in some jurisdictions the liability of the master for the negligence of a general manager or the head of a department does not depend on whether or not the negligence occurred in connection with a nondelegable duty,[12] in other jurisdictions in which an employee, to whom the master has intrusted the management of his business or a department thereof, is said to be a vice principal for whose negligence the master is liable, it appears that in most, if not all, cases in which the master has been held liable the negligence was in connection with a personal or nondelegable duty,[13] and in the final analysis it seems that the determination as to the liability of the master generally depends on whether the negligence is in connection with a personal duty of the master, the performance of which is within the scope of the authority of the negligent employee.[14]

Railroads. Certain persons in the employ of railroad companies have been regarded as vice principals, on the ground of being managers or heads of departments or branches of the business, as, for example, a superintendent,[15] an assistant superintendent,[16] a division superintendent,[17] a wreckmaster or roadmaster,[18] an assistant roadmaster,[19] and a master mechanic.[20] However, the courts have refused to recognize certain employees as heads of departments or branches of the service, although they exercised some authority over other em-

(2) What Constitutes Separate Department or Branch

In order to render the head-of-department rule applicable, there must be separate departments and not merely separate pieces of work in the same branch of service.

In order to render the head-of-department rule applicable there must be an actual separation of departments,[27] and a mere separate piece of work in one of the branches of service is not a department.[28] The performance of a separate piece of work independent of any control by the superior agents of a corporate master may constitute a separate department or branch of the business,[29] as, for example, certain independent construction operations.[30] A local plant[31] or a separate branch or shop in a single plant[32] may, according to some decisions, constitute a separate branch or department.

e. Superior-Servant Rule

(1) In general
(2) Repudiation of rule

(1) In General

Under the superior-servant rule, a servant given the power to control other servants is not deemed their fellow servant.

The so-called superior-servant rule, under which a servant given the power to control other servants is not their fellow servant where his negligence is the cause of an injury to an inferior servant, has been followed by some authorities,[33] and liability for the negligence of a superior servant in the performance of duties which otherwise would be regarded as delegable has been held imputable to the master.[34]

A suggested basis for the superior-servant rule is that the duty of using reasonable care in giving orders to servants[35] or the duty of superintending the work of employees where such work requires superintendence[36] is one of those obligations which the master cannot delegate so as to absolve himself from liability for their nonperformance or improper performance. In other cases the duty of the inferior servant to obey his superior servant seems to be the controlling idea.[37]

rule is to be applied depends on whether or not the so-called superior servant has the authority to superintend or control the injured servant,[38] and not merely on the grade or rank of the so-called superior servant;[39] and in the absence of such authority the master is not liable on the theory that the negligent servant is a superior servant.[40] The fact that the superior servant is subject to the orders of another does not render the former a fellow servant of those subject to his authority.[41]

Source of and manner of conferring authority. While the authority of the superior servant must come either from the master or from one standing in the place of the master,[42] a servant who has been duly authorized by an admitted agent or vice principal of the master may become a superior servant for whose negligence the master is liable.[43] In some jurisdictions at least there is a sufficient showing of authority by proof either that the master or his representative by direct act placed the superior servant in charge, or that the inferior servant was directed to assist, or to take instructions from, the superior servant.[44]

Railroads. In jurisdictions in which the superior-servant doctrine is recognized, under the general rule and subject to the qualifications of such rule, it has been held that certain superior servants in the employ of railroad companies are not fellow servants of other employees subject to their authority.[45] Thus as a general rule a foreman,[46] such as the foreman of a section or rail crew,[47] the foreman of a switching crew,[48] or a yard foreman,[49] is not in such jurisdictions regarded as a fellow servant of other employees working under him. Moreover, it has been held that the conductor of a train is not a fellow servant of other employees on the same train,[50] such as an engineer,[51] a fireman,[52] or a brakeman;[53] and there is authority for the view that a conductor is not a fellow servant of a car repair man whom the conductor has directed to repair a brake on the train[54] or of a section man who is temporarily working under the conductor.[55] The conductor in complete control of a work train is not regarded as the fellow servant of laborers on such train.[56]

The view has been taken that the conductor on a train is not the fellow servant of an employee on another train who is subordinate in rank and authority to such conductor.[57] There is authority for the view that a locomotive engineer is not a fellow servant of subordinates on the same train,[58] such as a fireman,[59] a brakeman,[60] or a porter;[61] and a like rule has been laid down in respect of the relation between an engineer on a yard engine and a switchman.[62]

Even in some jurisdictions in which the superior-servant doctrine is recognized, however, to some extent at least, the conductor of a train has been regarded as a fellow servant of the brakeman[63] and of the fireman[64] on such conductor's train; and the engineer has been regarded as a fellow servant of the fireman[65] and of the brakeman,[66] at least where by the rules of the company the train is under the control of the conductor.[67] The conductor[68] and the gripman[69] of a grip car have been regarded as fellow servants of the conductor of a trailer attached to such grip car. A section foreman[70] and a roadmaster[71] have been regarded as fellow servants of employees subject to their authority.

Shipping. Under the general rule it has been held that the master[72] or mate[73] and an inferior member of the crew are not fellow servants. A hatch tender having the duty to give signals to start and stop a winch used in loading materials on the ship, and also to see that the materials loaded are properly handled, has been held not a fellow servant with the operator of the winch.[74]

(2) Repudiation of Rule

In some jurisdictions the superior-servant rule has been repudiated and the master held entitled to rely on the fellow-servant rule notwithstanding the employee who caused the injury was of a higher grade or had control over the injured servant.

In many jurisdictions the superior-servant rule is either expressly or impliedly repudiated,[75] and it is held that the fact that the person whose negligence caused the injury was a servant of a higher grade than the injured servant, or that the latter was subject to the direction or control of the former, and was engaged at the time in executing the orders of the former, does not necessarily prevent the application of the fellow-servant rule to free the master from liability.[76] In these jurisdictions a mere foreman or superintendent[77] who is subordinate to other employees[78] is generally considered the fellow servant of those working under him.

Railroads. The general rule repudiating the superior-servant doctrine has frequently been applied with respect to servants of railroad companies,[79] as, for example, the foreman of a crew of section or track men,[80] a wreckmaster or roadmaster,[81]

81. Minn.—O'Niel v. Great Northern

the foreman of a repair train,[82] the foreman of car repairers,[83] the foreman in repair shops,[84] and a yardmaster or foreman.[85] Likewise a conductor has been regarded as a fellow servant of those on the train subject to his control,[86] as, for example, a fireman[87] or a brakeman.[88] Moreover, an engineer and a fireman[89] and an engineer and a brakeman[90] on the same train are regarded as fellow servants. A laborer on a construction or work train is generally held a fellow servant of a conductor[91] and an engineer thereon.[92]

Even in some jurisdictions in which the superior-servant rule has been rejected, however, there is authority for the view that the conductor of a train is not the fellow servant of employees under his direction and control.[93] Moreover, it has been held that if a conductor takes charge of the unloading of a car and his action is reasonably necessary for the orderly and timely running of his train, he is the representative of the railroad company as to another employee who assists in such unloading.[94]

Shipping. The relation of fellow servant has without adherence to the superior-servant doctrine been regarded as existing between the master or captain of a vessel and the mate,[95] between the master and other members of the crew,[96] and between the master and a subordinate member of the crew,[97] at least when the master of the vessel is on board;[98] and a like rule has been applied with respect to the relation between the engineer and an oiler.[99] However, even in jurisdictions in which the superior-servant rule has been rejected, the view has been taken that the master or captain of the vessel is not a fellow servant of other members of the crew[1] or at least is not a fellow servant of a common seaman.[2]

Generally a foreman of longshoremen and those working under him are regarded as fellow servants.[3]

Mines, quarries, and excavations. Under general rules particular employees engaged in mining or quarrying[4] or excavating[5] operations have been regarded as fellow servants of other employees subject to their authority.

f. Dual-Capacity Doctrine

Under the dual-capacity doctrine, where an employee is required to supervise the work and also to engage in common service with other employees, the master is liable for acts of the employee performed in his supervisory capacity but may rely on the fellow-servant rule to avoid liability for injuries resulting from acts attributable to the common service.

Some authorities, in determining the availability of the fellow-servant rule as a defense to the master, have applied the dual-capacity doctrine, under which the master is liable for what may be called the official acts of the superior employee resulting in the injury for which suit is brought, but not for his acts, such as assisting in manual labor, which are not within his duties to control, supervise, or manage, but which are the duty of inferior servants under his control.[6] In other words, where an employee is required to engage in a common service with his coemployees, and also to superintend the work in some measure, the master's liability for his negligent act depends on whether such act was attributable to his employment in the common service or whether it was one of superintendence.[7] Thus it is the act from which the injury results, performed by the person occupying this dual capacity, and not the rank, which is the true test of the master's liability thereunder.[8] While the dual-capacity doctrine applies where the master, by the terms of the employment, confers on the servant the duties of a vice principal and of a fellow servant,[9] no question as to dual capacity can arise where the employee's sole duties are to superintend, since in such case whatever he does within the scope of his employment he necessarily does as superintendent.[10]

Under the dual-capacity doctrine the mere fact that an employee sometimes or even generally labors with other employees subject to his authority does not relieve the master from liability;[11] in order to relieve the master from liability for the negligent act of the servant it must appear that the act was committed by the servant in his capacity as a fellow servant and not in his capacity as a vice principal;[12] and if the order given,[13] or the negligent act or omission,[14] which causes the injury is the exercise of the authority over others vested in the negligent employee his negligence is imputable to the master. On the other hand, the fact that one employee has authority to direct and control others is not of itself sufficient to render the master liable for the negligence of the employee having such authority;[15] and if the negligence of such employee consists of some act or omission which relates to his duty as a common laborer or servant with those under his control the master is not liable.[16] The relation of foreman or superior employee ends and that of fellow servant begins when,

Handling of merchandise in warehouse

A foreman directing several employees in the handling of merchandise in a warehouse, in working with the other employees in the performance of their common duties, is, and not until, the superior employee actually and actively engages in the particular manual work which gives existence to the changed relation.[17] In determining in which capacity an employee was acting under given circumstances each case must be decided on its own facts.[18]

In some jurisdictions the dual-capacity doctrine is either expressly repudiated or not fully recognized and the master is held liable without regard to the nature or the quality of the negligent act of the vice principal.[19]

a. In General

The general rule is sometimes laid down that it is the character of the act or service of the offending servant, and not his grade, rank, or title, which determines whether he is a fellow servant of other employees injured through his negligence.

In many jurisdictions in determining whether the master may escape liability on the ground that the employees concerned were fellow servants it is announced as the general rule that the character of the act or service performed by the negligent servant governs, and not the relation between servants;[20] or, as otherwise stated, the character of the act or service governs and not the grade, rank, or title of the negligent servant,[21] or even, as is said in some cases, the authority with which such servant is invested.[22]

Necessity for, and source of, authority. Generally it must appear that the negligent servant has duly been authorized, directly or by implication, to act in respect of the matter involved,[23] although there is authority for the view that the master may be liable if the negligence is in respect of a matter within the apparent scope of the authority of the negligent servant.[24] It may become important to consider the rank of the alleged vice principal in order to determine what duties are intrusted to him,[25] and in this connection it has been said that the extent of the authority of the negligent servant is always a material factor in determining whether he was empowered to act in those matters for the negligent performance or nonperformance of which the master is liable.[26] However, the mere fact that an employee is a foreman does not show that he is a representative of the master as to the latter's personal or nondelegable duties to his servants.[27] Where an employee on whom is imposed

b. Delegable or Nondelegable Duties Generally

(1) In general

(2) Distinctions between delegable and nondelegable duties

(1) In General

The master cannot escape liability under the fellow-servant rule where the negligent act of an employee constitutes a breach of a personal or nondelegable duty of the master, such as caring for a dangerous agency or providing reasonably safe methods of work.

Personal or absolute duties of a master cannot be delegated by him to a servant so as to relieve himself from liability on the ground that the negligence with respect thereto was that of a fellow servant.[30] A fortiori the master cannot escape liability where the duty is expressly imposed on him by the contract with the injured servant,[31] where the duty is imposed on him by statute,[32] or where he has assumed the duty.[33] Such duties are usually termed "nondelegable duties," and the servant on whom they are imposed is, in the exercise of such duties, a representative of the master or a vice principal,[34] and the grade, rank, or title of such servant is immaterial;[35] moreover, the liability of the master is not affected by the rank of the injured servant.[36] The rule that the master is liable although the default or neglect as to a nondelegable duty is on the part of an employee intrusted with its performance applies in the case of individuals[37] and of corporations.[38] If the specific act complained of is one which can be properly regarded as within the personal duty of the master, he is liable without regard to whether it is an act of negligent performance or one of omission.[39]

On the other hand, the general rule is that a servant is not a vice principal where he is supervising[40] or carrying out[41] the merely executive details of the work, or, as sometimes stated specifically or substantially, where the negligent servant is not performing a duty which the law imposes on the master,[42] or a duty which the alleged vice principal

Repair of vehicle
The acts of repairing a motortruck and placing of materials taken therefrom near and around it were duties which could be safely intrusted by the master to the discretion of the servant, and negligence, if any, of the servant resulting in injuries to a fellow servant, was not imputable to the master.—Hopkins v. owes only to the master,[43] regardless of his rank.[44] Where a statute imposes a particular duty on an employee as a servant and not as a representative of the master, the negligence of such employee is not imputable to the master.[45]

Employment of dangerous agencies. The duty of the master to care for a dangerous agency employed in his business cannot be so delegated as to relieve the master from responsibility.[46]

Methods of work. A master is liable for the negligence of a servant who is discharging the master's primary and nondelegable duty to provide a reasonably safe method of work[47] although where a proper method of work has been provided mere details in the performance thereof may be committed to fellow servants.[48]

Dual capacity. A servant may sustain a dual relation toward other servants in that he is a vice principal as to those duties imposed on him for the due performance of which the master cannot relieve himself from liability, while he is a mere fellow servant with reference to those acts in the performance of the work not connected with the personal duties of the master.[49]

Notice to employee on whom performance of nondelegable duties imposed. Where a master imposes the performance of his own primary or positive duty on an employee, notice to the latter with respect to matters affecting the performance of such duty is notice to the master,[50] regardless of the rank of such employee.[51]

(2) Distinctions between Delegable and Nondelegable Duties

The distinction is sometimes made that work of construction, preparation, and preservation is the absolute duty of the master, whereas work of operation is the duty of the servants; but this line is not clearly defined and has been said not to be applicable to every state of facts.

Much difficulty is encountered in determining whether the duty neglected in the particular case is that of the master or is the duty of a servant relating merely to the details of the work,[52] notwithstanding the rule that the line of demarcation between the absolute duty of the master and the duty of the servants is the line that separates the work of construction, preparation, and preservation from the work of operation.[53] This line, however, is not clearly defined,[54] and there is authority for the view that the test based on the distinction between the duty of construction, preparation, or repair on the one hand and the duty of operation on the other will not fit every state of facts,[55] and that there are personal duties of the master in connection with the carrying on of the work in hand for the negligent performance of which he may be liable although he has intrusted performance to a coemployee of the injured servant.[56] Another distinction sometimes resorted to is that between providing all permanent conditions of safety for the service required on the

c. Safe Place to Work

(1) In general
(2) Temporary or changing places and places prepared by servants
(3) Railroads
(4) Shipping
(5) Mines, quarries, and excavations

(1) In General

In general the master's duty to furnish his servants with a safe place to work and to keep such place reasonably safe cannot be delegated so as to enable him to rely on the fellow-servant rule to avoid liability for injury to an employee resulting from a breach of such duty.

The duty devolving on the master to furnish his servants a safe place to work in the first instance is one that cannot be delegated so as to relieve the master from liability on the ground that the negligence was the act of a fellow servant;[58] and a like rule applies with respect to the master's personal or primary duty with reference to keeping or maintaining the place reasonably safe,[59] although there is some authority to the effect that the master is not liable for the negligence of a servant to whom he has delegated the duty of maintaining the place in a reasonably safe condition if such servant has been carefully selected for his competency and fitness.[60]

While the master cannot escape liability on the ground that the place was rendered unsafe by the act of a fellow servant where he knew or should have known of its unsafe condition and failed to remedy the defect within a reasonable time,[61] as a general rule the master is not liable for the negligent act of a fellow servant which makes the place unsafe,[62] as where the danger is a transient one growing out of the negligence of a fellow servant[63] or where the defective condition is created by a fellow servant of the injured employee during

Mental condition of servant

Where mentally deficient servant was injured while assisting foreman, it being left to foreman to decide what work servant was capable of, and necessity for special warning, if servant's condition was such as to make place where he was injured unsafe or to entitle him to special warning employer is liable for his injury, but if it was safe to do work master is not liable.—Dziedzie v. the progress of the work and as an incident thereto.[64] So the negligence is generally regarded as that of a fellow servant for which the master is not liable where the act or omission[65] or, in some jurisdictions at least, the order given[66] which produces the unsafe condition is one involving merely operative details, even where the negligence relates to details of arrangement and execution in making[67] or keeping[68] a place safe, although in some jurisdictions a more liberal rule in favor of the injured servant in respect of the details of keeping a place safe has apparently been applied.[69] Broadly stated, the distinction observed in determining the liability of the master is between the furnishing of a suitable working place on the one hand and the use to which it is put on the other.[70]

Authority, duty, and scope of employment of negligent employee. In order to charge the master for the act of a negligent employee affecting the safety of the place it must appear that such employee was intrusted with the performance of the master's duty in respect of a safe place,[71] but the right of an employee charged with this duty to intrust such duty to a third person so as to charge the master has been recognized.[72] The master cannot rely on the alleged failure of a fellow servant to perform an act which would have made the place safe where it does not appear that the master had imposed on such fellow servant the duty to perform the act in question.[73] The master is not liable for an act of an employee which renders the place unsafe where in performing the act such employee was not engaged in the master's business.[74]

Places under control of third persons. Even though the place is under the control of a third person, the master cannot rely on the fellow-servant rule to avoid liability for the negligence of the employee to whom was intrusted the duty of protecting the injured servant from a danger known to the master.[75]

Statutory duty as to safety of place. Where a statute imposes on the master an absolute or personal duty as to a safe place to work he cannot in turn impose such duty on a servant so as to relieve himself from liability on the ground that the negligence with respect thereto was that of a fellow servant.[76]

Covering or guarding dangerous places. The duty to guard or to cover a dangerous place has been regarded as a personal duty of the master who cannot avoid liability for an injury resulting from negligence in connection with such duty by setting up the claim that the negligence was that of a fellow servant.[77] On the other hand, where the unsafe condition arises from the omission to use, or a careless use of, materials or appliances furnished or available for guarding or covering a dangerous place, the covering or guarding of the place is generally regarded merely as a detail of the work and the duty involved as that of a fellow servant and not of the master.[78] However, where the material available is not the proper material for guarding a dangerous place, the master cannot avoid liability on the ground that available material was negligently arranged about the place by fellow servants.[79] Where certain material is negligently placed by fellow servants and the conditions are known to, and have been adopted by, the master, such negligence is imputable to the master.[80]

Starting machinery or other appliances. The negligence ordinarily has been regarded as relating to details of operation and that of a fellow servant where the injury resulted from the act or omission of a coemployee in starting, or in failing to prevent the starting of, machinery or other appliances.[81] However, the right of the master to rely on the fellow-servant rule has been denied where the employee to whom such duty was intrusted started, or failed to prevent the starting of, machinery, and the duty breached was the duty to keep the place reasonably safe.[82]

(2) Temporary or Changing Places and Places Prepared by Servants

Where employees have the duty of making their own place of work, the fellow-servant rule ordinarily may be invoked to excuse the employer from liability for a breach of such duty resulting in injury to a coemployee; but the mere fact that a place of work is temporary or changes from time to time does not necessarily relieve the employer of liability.

As a rule an employee whose negligence affects the safety of the place is regarded as the fellow servant of the injured servant, and such negligence is not imputable to the master, where the employees, including the injured servant, are employed to make their own place in which to work, so that the place is the result of the very work for which they are employed,[83] even though, it has been held, the work is done in successive stages and the labor performed by one set of employees is prior in time to that performed by another set,[84] or where the place in which all are employed necessarily changes from time to time as the work progresses and the danger is an incident of the work.[85] Thus negligence in respect of mere details of the work looking to the protection of employees is ordinarily regarded as that of a fellow servant.[86] So the master may rely on the fellow-servant rule to avoid liability where the work consists in making safe the place and condition of which the injured servant complains,[87] especially where the injured servant is directly engaged in such work[88] or where the work itself involves the making of a reasonably safe place dangerous;[89] but the master may relieve the injured servant from the duty of making the place safe and thus prevent himself from setting up that the negligence was that of a fellow servant.[90] There is authority for the view that the master is not liable for the negligent act of a foreman or superintendent in making a place safe for employees, where such negligent act results in direct injury to another servant while the work of making the place safe is in progress.[91]

The fact, however, that a place of work is temporary[92] and changes from time to time,[93] or that the employees move from place to place in the course of their work,[94] does not necessarily relieve the master from liability for the negligence of an employee to whom the master's duty of maintaining the place in a reasonably safe condition has been intrusted; and the master may be charged with the negligence of employees in preparing a place which is subsequently furnished to the injured employee as a means by which the work is to be performed[95] or a place in which the work is to be carried on;[96] but there is authority for the view that the fact that the injured servant did not, and was not required to, construct the place as a means by which the work is to be performed does not necessarily prevent his being regarded as a fellow servant of those who did construct it.[97]

The master may not avoid liability for an injury to a servant while engaged in erecting a structure, on the ground that the negligence was that of a fellow servant, where the injury was due to a faulty design or plan of construction selected by the negligent employee.[98] There is authority for the view that, even though all servants are employed in a common construction enterprise, the negligence of those who are engaged in the performance of the duty of providing so-called permanent conditions of safety, which results in an injury to a servant not so engaged, is imputable to the master.[99]

(3) Railroads

Railroad companies have been held liable, the same as other employers, for injuries to an employee resulting from the negligence of another employee to whom has been intrusted the duty of furnishing or maintaining a safe place in which to work.

Under general rules a railroad company cannot avoid liability for the negligence of an employee to whom has been intrusted the duty of furnishing to other employees a safe place to work[1] or of keeping a place reasonably safe[2] on the ground that the negligent employee is a fellow servant of the injured employee, especially where the duty is imposed by statute.[3] This applies to the original construction of the roadway, including the track,[4] and to keeping it in a reasonably safe condition.[5]

Where the roadway is safe but is rendered temporarily unsafe by the act of a fellow servant, the company is not liable where it had no actual or constructive notice thereof.[6] So the view is generally taken that, where the unsafe condition of the roadway or other place at which the injured servant is working arises only because of the negligent act or omission of a fellow servant in connection with details of operation, the employer is not liable,[7] even, it has been held, where the negligent act occurs in connection with keeping the place safe,[8] especially where the injured servant was engaged in the work of rendering the roadway safe.[9] Thus the duty of opening and closing a railroad switch is not as a general rule regarded as one of the personal duties of a master but is a duty of a servant as a duty connected with operation;[10] it is not a defect in the roadbed for which a person thereby injured can recover from the company on an allegation of failure to maintain its roadbed in safe condition;[11] but there is authority for the view that a failure of an employee properly to operate a switch may constitute a breach of the master's duty to provide a safe track.[12]

Obstructions causing injuries to employees on trains. Where the duty of keeping the track free from obstructions is intrusted to a servant, he is not a fellow servant of train employees injured by the former's negligence.[13] So the company has been held liable for injuries to servants on trains caused by obstructions near the track even though the obstructions were put or left there by other servants of the company,[14] although the rule seems to be otherwise where the obstruction is merely temporary and arises out of acts or omissions connected with details of the work.[15]

Servant working about cars or locomotives. Where a servant, such as a car repairer or the like, is injured while at work under, between, or about engines or cars by the starting or backing of engines or cars, the negligent servant is usually considered a fellow servant.[16] However, the courts in some instances have refused to apply the fellow-servant rule on the ground that the negligence charged was that of an employee in connection with the master's duty to provide a safe place,[17] that, where one in authority orders a subordinate into a place of peril, it is the duty of the superior to furnish protection,[18] or that the one in authority required of the injured servant a service outside the line of the latter's employment and at a place other than that provided for the performance of his regular and ordinary duties.[19]

(4) Shipping

The general rules precluding reliance on the fellow-servant rule where the duty breached was that of furnishing a safe place to work or maintaining it in a reasonably safe condition have been applied in cases involving shipping.

The general rules which prevent the master from avoiding liability on the ground that an employee who has negligently failed to comply with the duty of furnishing a safe place to work[20] or of maintaining the place in reasonably safe condition[21] was a fellow servant have been applied in the case of injuries received on vessels. Moreover, the employer may not avoid liability by relying on the fellow-servant rule, although the place of work was rendered unsafe by another servant where the employer knew or should have known of its unsafe condition and failed to remedy it.[22] Ordinarily, however, where the injury results from the negligence of a servant with respect to mere details of the work,[23] even in connection with details of keeping the place safe,[24] such negligence is not imputed to the master. So negligence in connection with an ordinary duty in the management or the operation of a vessel has been regarded as that of a fellow servant.[25]

Uncovered hatchways. The negligence of a servant in covering, or in failing to cover, a hatchway is usually regarded as that of a fellow servant for which the master is not liable;[26] but the negligence charged has in some cases been regarded as that of an employee to whom has been intrusted the duty to provide a safe place.[27]

Lighting. The negligence of a servant in failing to use, or to make proper use of, available lighting facilities is usually regarded as that of a fellow servant for which the master is not liable;[28] but the failure properly to light the place at which the injured servant was working has been regarded as the negligence of an employee to whom has been intrusted the duty of providing a safe place.[29]

(5) Mines, Quarries, and Excavations

The master ordinarily is liable for a breach by his servant of the duty to provide and maintain a safe place to work, whereby other employees engaged in mining, quarrying, or excavating operations are injured.

Under the general rule, discussed supra subdivision c (1) of this section, the master has been held liable for the negligence of an employee to whom has been intrusted the duty of providing a safe place to work which resulted in an injury to an employee engaged in the work of excavating,[30] as where the trench or ditch in which the servant injured is working has been prepared by other employees in the performance of the master's duty to furnish a suitable place for the servant injured to carry on his work.[31] On the other hand, where the place is rendered unsafe by the failure of a fellow servant duly to perform his work, his negligence is not imputable to the master.[32] So the failure properly to brace or shore a ditch or trench has been regarded as the negligence of a fellow servant,[33] even where such failure is that of the employee in immediate charge of the work,[34] where sufficient material for bracing or shoring has been furnished. However, it has been held that this rule does not apply in the case of a latent defect of which the servant injured has no knowledge, but of which the representative of the master is informed;[35] and there is authority for the view that an employee who is especially charged with the duty of determining when a trench should be braced is not in respect of such duty a fellow servant of one employed as a laborer in the trench.[36]

Mines and quarries. The operator of a mine or quarry cannot avoid liability on the ground that the negligence complained of is that of a fellow servant where the duty to furnish a safe place to work[37] or to maintain it in reasonably safe condition[38] was intrusted to the negligent employee, although in some jurisdictions the employee whom the master has designated to perform the duty of maintaining the place of work in reasonably safe condition is regarded as a fellow servant, and the master is not liable where the employee so designated was carefully selected for his competency and fitness.[39]

The negligence of one acting merely in the capacity of a fellow servant of the injured servant in rendering the place unsafe, or in failing to provide for the safety of the place, is not imputable to the master.[40] Thus, where the place is continually changing as the work in which the servant injured is engaged is progressing, the master is not ordinarily liable for the negligence of a fellow servant which is the immediate cause of the injury,[41] and in such case negligence in the matter of making the place safe has been regarded as that of a fellow servant for which the master is not liable,[42] especially where the servant injured is one on whom is actually imposed the duty to engage in the operation of making the place safe,[43] although it has been held that, where the master has relieved the servant injured from the duty of making the place safe, liability cannot be avoided on the ground that the servant to whom such duty was intrusted was a fellow servant of the injured servant.[44] Negligence in connection with details of keeping the place safe has also been regarded as that of a fellow servant.[45]

Where a statute looking to the safety of a mine as a place to work is construed as imposing an absolute or primary duty on the master, he cannot avoid liability for the negligence of an employee to whom the duty has been intrusted on the ground that such employee is a fellow servant.[46] However, where a statute imposes a particular duty on an employee as a servant, and not as a representative of the master, the negligence of such employee is not imputable to the master.[47] Some statutes specifically provide that certain superior employees in discharging certain duties imposed by statute shall be regarded as acting as vice principals for mine owners or operators.[48]

d. Tools and Appliances

(1) In general

(2) Appliances constructed as part of work

(1) In General

The master is liable for the negligence of a servant intrusted with the nondelegable duty of the master to furnish safe tools, machinery, and other appliances; but ordinarily he may rely on the fellow-servant rule to escape liability for negligence in matters of detail in the management of safe machinery and appliances.

The master's duty to furnish safe tools, machinery, and other appliances is nondelegable, discussed supra § 204, and a servant to whom such duty is intrusted is a vice principal and the master is liable for his omission or negligence with respect thereto.[49] There are, however, many matters of detail in the management of safe and adequate machinery and appliances which must be intrusted to the operatives and as to which the master owes no duty except the employment of competent workmen,[50] and the line of division between the duty of the master to furnish and maintain safe and adequate machinery and appliances and that of the operative to manage and handle it with prudence and care is difficult to define by any general description.[51]

It has been held that, where the master has furnished safe appliances and the negligence consists in their use[52] or in the failure to use them at all, or the use of improper instead of proper appliances furnished, or the use of defective appliances where other safe appliances of the same kind had been furnished,[53] the negligence relates to a detail of the work, and the master is not liable on the theory of inability to delegate a personal duty. So, where the master has furnished safe tools and appliances, he is not responsible for an injury resulting from the use of a defective or insufficient appliance selected by a coemployee from the aggregate furnished,[54] but the master is not relieved from liability by the fact that he has furnished other safe material where the unsafe material is mingled with it and the defect is not discernible by a coemployee using such care as might reasonably be expected of him.[55] There is also authority for the view that, where a safe appliance has been furnished but the right of the servants generally to use it depends on the consent of another servant, the negligence of the latter is chargeable to the master.[56]

Appliances furnished by servant. Where a servant is authorized or required by the employment himself to furnish his own appliances for the work, the master is not liable where a fellow servant is injured because of defects therein.[57] A fortiori where machinery is furnished by a fellow servant against the master's orders, the master is not liable.[58]

Statutory duties. Under statutes requiring the guarding of machinery the negligence of a coemployee in failing to replace a statutory guard is not that of a fellow servant,[59] and the same rule applies to the failure to use a guard.[60] However, a statute requiring the furnishing of safe appliances does not make the master liable for the negligence of a coservant in operating a safe appliance.[61] A master cannot escape liability under a statute requiring him to guard dangerous machinery by ordering a subordinate employee to erect or assemble machinery in the erection or assembling of which the superiors are also engaged.[62] A statutory duty to avoid projecting set screws or bolts on revolving machinery cannot be delegated.[63]

Applications of rule to railroads. The duty of a railroad company to furnish its servants safe cars and locomotives is nondelegable.[64] On the other hand, where the injury does not result from the failure to furnish safe cars and locomotives but from the negligence of a fellow servant in the use thereof, the railroad company ordinarily is not liable.[65] For instance, where proper car couplers are furnished by the railroad company, it is not liable to a servant for the negligence of a coservant in using defective couplers.[66] Where a railroad company provided a proper headlight for its locomotive, the negligence of its servants in failing to light it was held the negligence of a fellow servant.[67]

(2) Appliances Constructed as Part of Work

(a) In general

(b) Platforms, scaffolds, and runways

(a) In General

Where the master undertakes merely to furnish the materials for the construction of an appliance by the workmen, the negligence of an employee in constructing the appliance is generally held to be that of a fellow servant for which the master is not liable.

The rule as to the nondelegable duty to furnish a safe place and appliances is subject to the exception that, where the master undertakes merely to furnish the materials needed for the construction of some appliance which is to be constructed by the workmen themselves as incident to the main work, the master's duty is performed if he furnishes suitable material and competent workmen, and the negligence of a coservant who constructs the appliance by which the employee is injured is that of a fellow servant for which the master is not liable.[68] In other words, if the preparation of the appliance is a part of the work which the servant is required to perform, the master is not liable for any defect in its preparation owing to the negligence of another servant.[69] The fact that an injured servant did not become an employee until after the negligent act complained of does not alter the relation of fellow servants.[70] However, where an appliance is constructed by one set of employees and is afterward used by other employees under the direction of the master, the servants constructing it are not regarded as the fellow servants of those using it,[71] and in construction work "it has been held that a portion of the work when completed may become an appliance furnished by the master by which the remaining work is to be prosecuted.[72] Where the preparation of the appliances is neither intrusted to, nor assumed by, the employees, the master may be guilty of negligence in furnishing defective appliances, although the workmen themselves are employed in the preparation of them.[73]

(b) Platforms, Scaffolds, and Runways

Negligence of an employee in constructing a scaffold, platform, runway, or the like is generally held that of a fellow servant, where the master has furnished proper materials for the work; but the master is liable where he has supplied defective materials.

Where a master furnishes proper materials for a scaffold, platform, runway, or the like, and it is constructed by coservants of one injured because of a defect therein, as a part of the work which they are employed to do, the master ordinarily is not liable.[74] On the other hand, it has generally been held that, where the appliance is furnished by the master as a completed instrumentality for the use of the employees who are to work thereon, the fellow-servant rule is not applicable;[75] and in some cases the master has been held liable on the theory that the scaffold was of a permanent character.[76] The master is liable for the furnishing of improper or defective materials to be used in constructing the scaffold, and where the duty to furnish the materials is delegated to a servant, he becomes a vice principal with respect thereto.[77] An employer is not liable for negligence of his superintendent in sending a workman on staging constructed by other contractors with their own planks and for their own purposes.[78]

Statutory duty. The master is generally held liable where the duty to furnish safe and suitable scaffolding and like appliances is imposed by statute.[79] There is, however, some authority holding that the defense of fellow service is available as respects responsibility for the construction of a working place, such as a scaffold, despite a statute providing that all scaffolds or structures used in the erection of any building shall be well and safely supported and so secured as to insure the safety of persons working thereon.[80]

Supervision of foreman. In those jurisdictions in which the superior-servant rule is not followed, as discussed supra § 332 e (2), the master is not liable under the general rule exempting him from liability where the appliance is constructed by coservants of the one injured, although it was constructed and erected under the supervision of a foreman.[81] Under the superior-servant rule, however, negligence of a foreman may be attributed to the master.[82]

e. Maintenance, Inspection, and Repair

(1) In General

Although the authorities are not unanimous, the general rule is that an employee discharging the master's duty of inspection and repair is not a fellow servant of an employee injured by his default; but this rule does not apply to simple incidental repairs of a temporary character.

The duty of the master to furnish a safe place and appliances is a continuing one and is nondelegable, as discussed supra §§ 201, 204. Hence it is the rule in most jurisdictions that, although the master

Improper installation of blocks and tackles
Where fact that fellow employees and not employer, usually installed blocks and tackles for use of pipe fitters was undisputed, pipe fitter, who was injured by fall of block and tackle, could not recover for employee's failure to install it properly, regardless of what class of employees actually installed it.—Gallagher v. California Brick Co., C.C.A. Fla., 5 F.2d 464.

Selection of short planks
Plasterer's tender, selecting or rearranging planks on scaffold as ordered by foreman, was injured plasterer's fellow servant, for whose negligence in selecting planks too short to span uprights plastering contractor was not liable.—McIntyre v. McIntyre, 171 A. 329, 86 N.H. 479.

has employed a competent servant for the purpose of keeping the place and appliances safe and discharging his duty of inspection and repair, such servant is not a fellow servant of one who has been injured by his default.[83] Accordingly, under the ordinarily accepted rule, the duty to inspect a mine and its appliances cannot be delegated so as to relieve the master from responsibility where a miner is injured because of the failure to do so.[84] Likewise the duty to take precautions to avoid injuries from unexploded blasts is regarded as nondelegable.[85] An employee making repairs ordinarily is regarded as performing a nondelegable duty of the master and as such not a fellow servant of an employee injured by his negligence while so engaged,[86] although there is also authority to the contrary.[87] In some jurisdictions the rule seems to be that, if the master has exercised due care in selecting a competent servant to inspect and repair, such servant is a mere fellow servant while in the performance of that duty.[88]

There is no nondelegable duty of inspection of an appliance constructed by the servants in the course of their employment.[89] If both the negligent and the injured servant were engaged in repair work, the master has been held not liable.[90] The master is not liable where the duty devolving on the negligent servant could have been fulfilled by merely replacing the defective appliance with a sound appliance from a stock furnished by the master.[91] A failure to report to the proper servant an appliance that is out of order and needs repairs does not of itself make the master liable for an injury resulting from the failure of repair.[92]

Incidental inspection and repair. The rule that a servant intrusted with the duty to inspect and repair is not a fellow servant does not apply to defects arising in the daily use of the machines or appliances, which are not of a permanent character and do not require the help of skilled mechanics to repair, but which may easily be and are usually remedied by the workmen, and to repair which proper and suitable materials are supplied;[93] and, when the employee's duty to inspect or repair is incidental to his duty to use the apparatus in the common employment, he is not intrusted with the master's duty to his fellow servants, and the master is not responsible to his fellow servants for his negligence.[94] The master is not bound to inspect simple hand tools while in the possession of his servants to see that they do not become defective, as discussed supra § 235, and, when he has furnished a sufficient number of tools of this character which remain in the possession of the employee, the master is not liable for the act of an employee who is not charged by him with any duty to look after or provide tools of this character in selecting one which is defective and unfit for use.[95] Where the work which the servants are employed to do necessarily changes the character of the appliances as to safety as the work progresses, the duty of care for the safety of appliances in such cases devolves on the servants to whom the work is intrusted.[96] unanimous, a servant having the duty to repair or inspect cars or other railroad appliances is not considered a fellow servant of other railroad employees injured by improper performance of such duty so as to relieve the railroad company of liability.

The general rule is that a servant employed to repair or inspect cars, engines, or other appliances is not a fellow servant of other employees of the railroad engaged in working on the trains or about the yards, where the latter are injured by the negligence of the former in failing properly to inspect or repair.[97] In other words, the duty of a railroad company to furnish safe appliances and a place to work extends to the inspection and repair thereof.[98] There are decisions, however, exempting the railroad company, where it has used due care in selecting a competent servant to inspect and make repairs,[99] at least where the negligence was in inspecting the loading of a car[1] or where the duty of inspection is incidental to the use of an appliance.[2] Where defects are latent and not discoverable by an ordinary inspection, it has been held that the master is not liable where he has employed a competent inspector.[3]

Car inspector. A car inspector ordinarily is regarded as vested with a duty of the master so as to be a vice principal.[4] He is not a fellow servant of a trainman so as to relieve the master from liability for the negligence of such inspector in failing to discover a defect which caused an injury to the trainman.[5] There is, however, authority to the effect that all that is required of the master is the furnishing of a competent servant.[6]

Track repairers or inspectors. Although there is some authority to the contrary,[7] an inspector of the roadbed of a railway,[8] or track repairers, including a section foreman, whose negligence in keeping the road in repair is the cause of the injury,[9] ordinarily are not regarded as fellow servants of injured train employees. A similar rule applies as to employees charged with the duty of repairing a railroad bridge.[10]

Cars of another railroad company. A railroad company is bound to inspect the cars of another company used upon its road, just as it would inspect its own cars. It owes this duty as master, and is responsible for the consequences of such defects as would be disclosed or discovered by ordinary inspection. When cars come to it from another road, which cars have defects, visible or discernible by ordinary examination, it must either remedy such defects or refuse to take the cars, and one to whom such duty is delegated has been held a vice principal.[11]

f. Supervision and Direction

An employee performing the master's primary duty of directing or supervising the work, and adopting necessary precautions to permit the work to be carried on safely, ordinarily is not considered a fellow servant of those injured by his neglect.

One to whom the master has intrusted his primary duty to exercise such direction, control, and supervision over the work as may be required to carry it on with reasonable safety to those employed therein is, in the performance of such duty, not a fellow servant.[12]

As a general rule, an employee to whom is delegated the duty of the master to protect other employees against injury and to exercise reasonable care to keep the working place safe cannot be regarded as a fellow servant of those injured by his

g. Instructions and Warnings

(1) In general
(2) Warnings during progress of work

(1) In General

The duty of a master to warn servants of the dangers of the employment ordinarily cannot be delegated to an employee so as to permit the master to escape liability for a breach of such duty.

A master who owes a duty to instruct and warn the servant as to the dangers of the employment ordinarily cannot escape liability for injuries resulting from a breach of such duty on the ground that the employee to whom such duty was intrusted was a fellow servant of the injured employee,[17] although there is some authority to the effect that the negligence, if any, may be that of a fellow servant where the work is of such a character as to require no special skill or instruction[18] or where the danger is obvious and the servant has had experience.[19]

Assurances of safety and promises to warn. An employee acting within the scope of his authority in making assurance of safety,[20] and in promising to warn the coemployee in case of danger,[21] or to protect him,[22] has been held to be acting as a vice principal and not as a fellow servant. On the other hand, it has been held not to have been within the authority of a particular employee to agree to guard other employees against danger,[23] and also that the master is not bound by an assurance given as a mere detail of the work.[24] In order to constitute an assurance of safety it is not necessary that the employer, represented in the person of his foreman, should in express terms assure the employee of the safety of the work, but it is sufficient if under the circumstances the foreman's acts and words are in effect such an assurance.[25]

(2) Warnings during Progress of Work

As a rule the master is not responsible for an employee's breach of a duty to warn of dangers arising from execution of the details of the work; but he may be liable for an employee's failure to warn of a danger impending because of some independent act performed for the master's purpose.

It is difficult to reconcile the authorities on the question whether the neglect of a servant charged with the duty of warning the employees of dangers arising during the progress of the work is to be regarded as that of the master or that of a fellow servant.[26] On the proposition that the duty to instruct and warn as to dangers arising from the execution of the general details of the work relates to the duties of the servants as between themselves so that a failure or negligence with respect thereto is that of a fellow servant, exempting the master from liability, the decisions are in substantial accord,[27] except in so far as a contrary view is demanded by the importance attached to the grade, rank, or control of the offending servant in the particular jurisdiction, as discussed supra § 332. Where the duty of giving warning is expressly imposed by statute on the employee, the master is not liable for his neglect.[28]

On the other hand, it has been held that a failure to warn of a danger impending because of some independent act performed for the master's purpose is a failure in a primary obligation for which the master is liable,[29] as where the employee is at work in a place safe in itself which will become dangerous unless a prior warning of the impending danger is given and the master has required such warning to be given or customarily has assumed to give it through an employee,[30] or in cases in which the employee can be protected in his place of work only by a warning that it is about to become dangerous.[31] The duty of the master to warn his employees of dangers arising out of the progress of the work which are known to him but unknown to them cannot be delegated in such a manner as to relieve the master from the results of its nonperformance.[32]

Starting machinery. It has been held that, where an employee is in a position which will become dangerous on the starting of machinery, the negligence of a coemployee in starting such machinery without warning is attributable to the master;[33] but there is also authority holding the act of an employee in starting machinery without a signal to be the negligence of a fellow servant.[34]

Moving cars. According to some authorities, where an employee is in a work place which will become dangerous if railroad cars are moved without warning, the negligence of a coemployee in failing to give such warning is attributable to the master.[35] According to other authorities, however, the negligence is held to be that of a fellow servant.[36]

Railroad section crew
A railroad company may be found liable for the negligent failure of one member of a section crew to warn his fellows, when the person injured has reasonably intrusted his safety to the watchfulness of others, and, acting in reliance on some-

trary has also been held.[39]

Blasting. The failure to give warning of a blast where such work is being carried on continuously has been held by some authorities to be the negligence of a fellow servant,[40] while by other authorities it has been held to be a default in the duty of the master.[41] So the duty to warn a succeeding shift of miners of an unexploded blast has been held not delegable,[42] although, on the other hand, it has been held that a failure to warn an employee engaged in making preparations for a blast as to unexploded charges is the negligence of a fellow servant.[43]

h. Rules

The master cannot escape responsibility for failure to promulgate rules necessary for the conduct of his business by delegating the duty to an employee; but where he has performed such duty he cannot ordinarily be held liable for failure of an employee to observe the rules.

The duty of the master to promulgate necessary rules for the conduct of the business cannot be delegated so as to shield him from responsibility.[44] However, where the master has performed his duty in this respect, he cannot be held liable, where he has used reasonable care in selecting competent servants, for their failure to observe such rules,[45] although the contrary has been held where the violation results in a failure of the master to discharge one of his nondelegable duties.[46] Where the master knows that one set of servants have so negligently done their work as to occasion danger to a fellow servant, it is his duty to interpose and take reasonable means to see that the rules are complied with, the work properly done, and the danger removed.[47]

i. Orders

An employee's order given in the direct exercise of authority conferred on him by the master, as, for example, where such employee directs the performance of work in a dangerous place, is not usually considered an act of a fellow servant.

An act in the direct exercise of the authority conferred by the master on one employee over his coemployees is not that of a fellow servant.[48] Accordingly, where the negligence complained of is in the giving of an order which it is the duty of the employee to obey, it is not that of a fellow servant but is that of a representative of the master;[49] and an order by one in control which in effect assigns the servant a dangerous place at which to work without warning of the risk incurred partakes of the duty of the master and is not merely that of a fellow servant.[50] A like rule has been applied when the order is coupled with an assurance of safety,[51] or where dangerous work is directed to be performed in an unsafe manner,[52] or where one in control orders a servant into a dangerous place and then with knowledge of his presence renders the place more dangerous by his negligent act.[53] However, an order as to a mere detail of the work not involving an affirmative duty of the master does one else's care, has maintained no lookout for himself.

Advising workmen to maintain lookout not make the employee giving it a vice principal[54] although it may result in putting the servant into a dangerous place.[55]

Order to do work outside employment. The general rule that servants of the same master who are directly coöperating with each other in the particular business are fellow servants, discussed supra § 327, does not apply in certain cases where a servant is ordered to do work outside his regular employment,[56] particularly where it exposes him to a danger not contemplated in the contract of service;[57] and this rule has been applied in cases where one having the control and direction of a minor employee orders him to undertake an act outside of the scope of his employment and of a hazardous character,[58] although there is also authority to the contrary.[59]

Train dispatcher. Although there is some authority to the contrary,[60] a train dispatcher having control of the movements of trains upon a railroad is, in the performance of his duties as such, ordinarily held to be a vice principal as to other employees of the railroad injured by reason of his negligence;[61] and one who performs the duties of a train dispatcher,[62] such as a station agent,[63] is a vice principal while acting as train dispatcher.

Telegraph operators and other servants transmitting orders. One who merely transmits orders has been held a fellow servant.[64] Thus a telegraph operator whose duty it is to transmit information with respect to the location of trains upon the road and communicate instructions for running them, received by him from the train dispatchers, is the fellow servant of employees in charge of such train.[65] A telegraph operator whose duty it is to display signals to govern the running of trains is a fellow servant of those in charge of a train injured in a collision caused by the operator's neglect of such duty.[66]

j. Signals

A servant giving signals during the performance of the work ordinarily is not regarded as performing a primary duty of the master, at least where the employment is not dangerous.

A servant, whose duty it is to give signals during the performance of the work, ordinarily is not regarded as performing a primary duty of the master.[67] However, he is by some authorities so regarded where the employment is necessarily dangerous[68] or where the employee is at work in a place safe in itself but which by independent work for the master's purposes is rendered dangerous unless signals are given.[69] Where the safety of the place where the servant is at work is under the control of the master and the servant depends on signals being conveyed to him by others for his protection, the negligence of an employee charged with the duty of giving signals is that of a vice principal.[70] Further, an employee who is directing the

Temporary absence of signalmen
Stevedoring company, which provided extra men to take place of any gangwaymen temporarily absent from duties in course of loading vessel, was not liable for negligence of such men in failing to perform their assigned duties during temporary absence of signalmen whose duty it was to signal lowering of draft into hold, resulting in injuries to longshoreman.—Healy v. work by signals has been held to be a vice principal.[71] The master is liable where the negligence is in the system of signals provided rather than in the default of the signalmen.[72]

k. Selection, Retention, and Number of Coemployees

An employee ordinarily is not deemed a fellow servant in so far as he represents the master in the discharge of the master's duties as to the selection and retention of suitable and sufficient servants.

A servant who represents the master in the discharge of his duty as to the selection and retention of suitable servants is a vice principal and not a fellow servant.[73] Where a servant becomes incompetent, the negligence of the employee whose duty it is to employ and discharge, in thereafter retaining him, is the negligence of a vice principal.[74] Where a statute prohibits the employment of minors in certain hazardous employments, a servant who under express or implied delegation of authority puts a minor at work in violation of the statute is discharging a primary or nondelegable duty of the master.[75]

Assignment to particular task. Although there is some authority to the contrary,[76] the selection and assignment of employees for a particular task has been held a delegable detail as to which an employee acts as a fellow servant.[77] A railroad company has been held liable where a railroad engineer leaves his engine in the management of the fireman or other employee unskilled in running an engine, and a fellow servant is injured thereby;[78] but there are also contrary holdings.[79]

Supply of sufficient number of servants. The duty of using reasonable care to supply a sufficient number of servants to perform the work with reasonable and ordinary safety to those engaged in it is one which cannot be delegated to a servant so as to relieve the master from liability,[80] but the assignment of a sufficient number to a particular task when an adequate force is available ordinarily has been held a matter of detail as to which negligence is that of a fellow servant.[81]

3. Constitutional or Statutory Provisions as to Master's Liability for Injuries by Fellow Servant

§ 334. In General

Constitutional or statutory provisions have abrogated or modified the common-law fellow-servant doctrine in many jurisdictions.

Statutes making the master liable for personal injuries sustained by an employee through the negligence of a fellow servant have been construed as abrogating the common-law rule under which it is a defense to the employer when the injury was due to the negligence of a fellow servant in the course of a common employment.[82] In other jurisdictions the common-law doctrine of the fellow servant, as far as it affects the liability of the master for injuries to his servant resulting from the acts or omissions of any other servant or servants of the common master, is abrogated as to employees in certain hazardous occupations by an article of the constitution,[83] or by statute,[84] or by a legislative act declaring certain occupations to be hazardous in compliance with the constitutional mandate.[85] Such an article of the constitution is self-executing and abrogates the common-law doctrine, as affecting the master's liability for injury to the servant from acts of a fellow servant, as to an employee of a mining company who may recover as if the negligence of the fellow servant was the negligence of the master.[86] The constitutional provision is not restricted to those employees only who are engaged in the specially hazardous work, but extends to all employees doing work essential in carrying on the business.[87]

The master will be liable for injuries suffered by a servant through the negligence of a fellow servant in cases falling within the purview of constitutional or statutory provisions changing the common-law rule.[88] The liability of a master may be either primary, as arising from breach of a nondelegable duty, or secondary, as arising from the maxim, Qui facit per alium facit per se.[89]

§ 335. Validity, Construction, and Effect in General

The courts have upheld the validity of statutes modifying or abrogating the common-law fellow-servant doctrine and construed them liberally to effectuate their purpose.

The courts have upheld the validity of statutes modifying or abrogating the fellow-servant doctrine.[90] While statutes of this character are in derogation of the common law and, therefore, not to be extended by implication,[91] it has been held that they should be liberally construed to effect the purposes for which they were enacted.[92] The purpose of such provisions is to restrict the use of the fellow-servant doctrine as a defense,[93] and to stimulate employers to greater diligence for the safety of their employees.[94] Such statutes do not take away any common-law remedy the servant may have;[95] neither do they relieve him of that care and caution required of him by the common law,[96] but in the cases to which they apply they are construed to preclude the defense of assumption of the risk of injury from the negligence of fellow servants.[97] The servant is held not to assume the risk of injury from the negligent act of a fellow servant until he has knowledge and appreciates the danger,[98] the rules applied being the same as those applied in determining the question of assumption of the risk of other dangers of the employment,[99] and the servant is entitled to assume that the fellow servant will exercise due care.[1]

Where a statute modifies or abrogates the fellow-servant doctrine only in respect of certain classes of employers, the doctrine is under such a statute changed only with respect to the class designated,[2] and a statute abrogating the common-law fellow-servant rule does not create a liability against particular classes of corporations where no liability existed prior to the enactment of the statute.[3] Some statutes apply where, and only where, the employer is a corporation,[4] and have no application to an individual employer[5] or to a partnership.[6]

Statutes not expressly relating to servants. Before the passage of the employers' liability acts in this country, certain statutes were enacted making railroad or other companies liable to "any person" injured by reason of their negligence in certain particulars, and it was held that such statutes did not change the common-law rule as to a master's nonliability to a servant for injuries due to the negligence of a fellow servant.[7]

Acts out of scope of employment. The statutes do not make the master liable for an injury to an employee caused by a servant acting without authority wholly outside the scope of his employment.[8]

Willful acts. Where the case is within the statute, the fact that the injury is from the willful, wanton, reckless, or intentional wrong of the fellow-servant does not prevent a recovery.[9]

Proceedings in rem. The provisions of such a statute have been held applicable to proceedings in rem against a vessel under another statute providing that, in cases of negligent injury by a boat or vessel, an action may be brought against the boat or vessel by name rather than in personam against the owner.[10]

§ 336. Effect on Care Required of Fellow Servant

Under statutes modifying or abrogating the fellow-servant doctrine there is no obligation on a servant to exercise extraordinary care, but the master may be held responsible for injuries to an employee proximately resulting from the fellow servant's failure to exercise ordinary care.

The statutes making employers liable to an employee for injuries caused by the negligence of a fellow servant do not have the effect of requiring the exercise of extraordinary diligence and care on the part of the latter.[11] It is sufficient if he exercises toward the injured servant that degree of care which prudent persons ordinarily exercise under like circumstances.[12] Where men are working together, each has a right to expect his fellow workman to exercise due care in the premises for the safety of the other,[13] and to devote his attention to the business in hand,[14] and a fellow servant's failure to observe due care will be regarded as negligence rendering his employer liable under such statutes, for injuries to an employee proximately caused thereby,[15] but, if the act of the fellow servant claimed to have caused the injury did not constitute negligence or other wrong, the employer may not be held responsible in damages.[16]

Customary methods. As a general rule, it is not negligence in a fellow servant to follow the customary methods of work,[17] unless the circumstances are such as to render such methods dangerous.[18] On the other hand the master will be held liable for injuries to a servant caused by the negligence of a fellow servant in failing to observe the customary methods of work.[19]

Proximate cause of injury. Where the right of recovery is predicated on the negligence of a fellow servant, such negligence must be the proximate cause of the injury.[20]

§ 337. Effect of Absence of Negligence of Master in Respect of Methods of Work

The employer's exercise of due care in respect of methods of work and providing competent fellow servants will not preclude his liability for injuries to an employee resulting from the negligence of fellow servants under statutes changing the common-law doctrine.

Under statutes modifying or abrogating the fellow-servant doctrine, a master will be liable for injuries to a servant resulting from the negligence of a fellow servant, although the master has been guilty of no negligence in respect of his methods of work,[21] or in providing competent fellow servants,[22] provided the servant could not, by the exercise of ordinary care, have avoided the consequences to himself of such negligence, and provided further that he was not himself guilty of any contributory negligence.[23]

§ 338. Statutes Declaratory of Common Law

Some statutes are substantially declaratory of the common-law doctrine as to liability for injuries caused by fellow servants.

In the course of a development of legislation affecting the liability of the master for injuries to his servant, laws have been enacted in some states which are merely declaratory of the common-law rule as it existed in those states which had adopted neither the superior-servant nor the different-department rule;[24] and, in some states, it has been provided by statute that, except in case of railroad companies, the master is not liable to a servant for injuries arising from the negligence or misconduct of other servants about the same business.[25]

§ 339. Statutes Defining "Fellow Servant" and "Vice Principal"

Statutes defining the terms "fellow servant" and "vice principal" do not change the common-law liabilities of masters for the negligence of their servants, but merely afford an authoritative definition of such terms.

In some jurisdictions, the terms "fellow servant" and "vice principal" are defined by statute.[26] The purpose and effect of such statutes are not to change and extend the liabilities of masters for the negligence of their servants,[27] but their sole object and effect are to give an authoritative legislative definition to the terms "vice principal" and "fellow servant," and to leave the liabilities of the masters for the acts of their servants as they were before the laws were enacted.[28]

§ 340. Superior Servant Rule

a. In general
b. Superintendence

a. In General

Under statutory provisions existing in some jurisdictions the employer may be held responsible for injuries caused by the negligence of a superior, as distinguished from a fellow servant.

In several jurisdictions the superior-servant rule which had been adopted in some of the states before the enactment of any statute, as discussed supra § 332, is now recognized with more or less qualification by statutory provision,[29] and particularly in the case of employees engaged in hazardous occupations.[30] In some states the liability of a master is extended by statute to injuries caused by the negligence of any person engaged as superintendent, manager, foreman, or any other person in charge or control of works, plants, or machinery, or by the negligence of any person in charge of or directing the particular work in which the employee was engaged at the time of the injury or death.[31] It is not necessary, in order to render the statute applicable, that the foreman, whose negligence caused the injury, should have power to hire and discharge men,[32] and the mere fact that the foreman performed an act of manual labor will not make him a fellow servant when it was done in the line of his duty as such foreman.[33] Such a statute, however, does not constitute every person doing the manual labor of operating the levers of an engine a vice principal of the employer, for whose negligence the latter would be liable to other employees,[34] and the fact that the statute provides that the master may be held liable for negligence of a foreman, manager, "or other person" in authority does not enlarge the scope of the act so as to exclude the fellow-servant defense in every case of negligence of an employee in charge of any machine or device used in the employer's business.[35] Statutes of this character operate to exclude the defense of fellow servant only where the injury was caused by one in authority over the injured employee.[36] Where the vice principal undertakes work in simple co-operation with other servants, he becomes for the time being a mere fellow servant with them and the statute has no application.[37]

Under some statutory provisions an employer is liable for injuries to an employee caused by negligence of another employee engaged in superintendence or direction of the work.

In some jurisdictions the statute imposes liability on the master where the injury to his servant is caused by the negligence of a coservant intrusted with and exercising superintendence.[38] In other jurisdictions, the master is made liable only for the negligence of one whose "principal or sole" duty is that of superintendence, while intrusted with and exercising superintendence,[39] although in some jurisdictions it is further provided by statute that the master is liable for the negligence of any person acting as superintendent with the authority or consent of the employer, in the absence of one whose "principal or sole" duty is that of superintendence.[40] These statutes in so far as adopted in those states which have rejected the superior-servant doctrine change the common-law rule and enlarge the liability of the master.[41]

Who are superintendents. The question whether an employee is a superintendent,[42] or one whose "sole and principal" duty is that of superintendence,[43] within the meaning of the statute, is usually to be determined under the circumstances of the particular case. It is not necessary to show that the superintendence was over the servant who complains of the negligence of the person intrusted with it.[44] Under such statutes an employee may be a superintendent, although there is a general superintendent over him,[45] and even though a superior of the servant exercising superintendence was present at the time of the injury,[46] or although he incidentally performs manual labor a part of the time.[47] However, an employee is not ordinarily regarded as one whose "sole or principal" duty is that of superintendence, where he does the same work as other laborers,[48] or where he works with his hands in doing manual labor the greater portion of his time,[49] although an employee may be so engaged under such peculiar circumstances that quite continuous laboring with his hands is a necessary part of the duty of superintendence.[50]

Employee acting as superintendent in absence of superintendent. Under a provision making the master liable for the negligence of any person acting as superintendent with the authority or consent of the employer, in the absence of the superintendent, whose sole or principal duty is that of superintendence, such an acting superintendent need not be a person whose "sole or principal" duty is that of superintendence if he acts with the knowledge of the employer.[51] The fact that the absence of the superintendent was brief and temporary does not relieve an employer of liability for the negligence of an acting superintendent, if, in fact, he was authorized to act during such absence.[52] The master, however, is not liable under the statute where the work was such that he was not bound to furnish a superintendent;[53] and, although a master may have several employees whose sole and principal duty is superintendence, yet a master is not liable for the negligence of an employee who is clothed only with some powers of direction in the absence of the regular superintendent, when it does not appear that the regular superintendent was absent from the work at the time.[54]

Nature of negligent act. Under statutes of this kind it is generally held that the negligent act must be one of, or pertaining to, superintendence,[55] and the negligence complained of must occur not only during the superintendence, but substantially in the exercise of it.[56] However, it has been held, under a statute providing that the fellow servant defense is not available where injuries to a servant are caused by the negligence of one intrusted with superintendence or authority to direct, that a master is liable, although the negligent act was in what would otherwise be a detail of the work,[57] and that the master's liability is not limited to injuries resulting from negligence occurring in the exercise of superintendence, but extends to negligence in the performance of such an act as would naturally be performed by ordinary fellow servants.[58]

An act may be one of superintendence where it relates to the furnishing of a safe place to work or safe appliances or to the keeping of them in a safe condition.[59] On the other hand, the act is not one of superintendence where, at the time and in doing the act complained of, the servant whose negligence is complained of is engaged in mere manual labor which is the duty of a common workman.[60] However, it is held that the servant is engaged in an act of superintendence, although he is at the time of the injury performing an act of manual labor, where it is done pursuant to directing the work and in furtherance thereof.[61] An act done voluntarily while superintending, where not within the scope of the duties of a servant so acting and without the direction or consent of the master, is not an act of superintendence.[62]

§ 341. Negligence of Person to Whose Orders Injured Employee Was Bound to Conform

Under some statutory provisions liability is imposed on an employer for injuries to his employee resulting from negligence of another employee to whose orders the injured one is bound to conform.

Under some statutory provisions, liability is imposed on the master for injuries resulting from negligence of any person in its service to whose orders or direction the injured employee at the time of the injury was bound to conform, and did conform.[63] Under such statutes it has been held that there can be no recovery unless the injured servant is acting under some special order in respect of the particular service in which he was engaged when injured, as distinguished from general instructions as to duties connected with his employment generally.[64] The injury must be caused by the negligence of such superior servant[65] who must have had authority to give the order,[66] and the injury must have resulted from obedience to the order.[67] Furthermore, the injured servant must have been bound to conform to the order.[68]

§ 342. Different Department Statutes

Under some statutory provisions the fellow servant doctrine is abrogated as to servants in different departments.

The different-department rule, as discussed supra § 331, is expressly adopted by statute in some states, and an employee may recover for injuries caused by the negligence of a servant in a different department.[69]

§ 343. Acts or Omissions in Obedience to Rules

Under statutes making the master liable for injuries to his servant resulting from obedience to rules, he will not be responsible for injuries resulting from disobedience.

A statutory provision making the master liable where the injury results from the act or omission of any person done or made in obedience to any rule, regulation, or by-law of the corporation, or in obedience to the particular instructions given by any person delegated with the authority of the corporation in that behalf, does not make the master liable where a duty is enjoined by rule, etc., on a servant and the duty is neglected or negligently performed,[70] or where the injury did not result from the order.[71] Under statutes broadly imposing liability on the master for injuries to an employee caused by the negligence of a fellow servant, the matter may be held liable notwithstanding the negligent act was in direct disobedience of rules promulgated by the master.[72]

§ 344. Defects in Ways, Works, Machinery, Etc.

Under statutes making an employer liable where injury to his employee results from defects in the ways, works, or machinery not discovered or remedied because of the negligence of one intrusted by the employer with the duty of seeing that they are in proper condition, it must be shown that the person so intrusted either knew or should have known of the defect.

Under statute in some jurisdictions, the master is liable where the injury results from defects in the ways, works, machinery, etc., not discovered or remedied, owing to the negligence of some person intrusted by the master with the duty of seeing that they are in proper condition;[73] but it must be shown that the servant intrusted with such duty had knowledge of the defect or was negligent in not discovering it.[74] Such provisions seem to be, at least in part, merely a statutory reiteration of the common-law rule that the master cannot escape liability for the failure to furnish a safe place to work or safe appliances by delegating the duty to a coservant of the injured employee.[75] A statute providing that, in actions to recover from an employer for injuries to an employee, the negligence of a fellow servant is not a defense where the injury was caused or contributed by any defects in the appliances or the negligence of any person in charge applies to all employers as far as it relates to defects in the works or plants under their control, and of which defects they can have knowledge, through ordinary care.[76] Under statutes providing that an employee shall not be deemed to have assumed the risks of his employment in any case where injury or death results in whole or in part from negligence of the master, it has been held that an employee operating machinery does not assume the risk of negligence of a fellow servant charged with the duty of inspecting such machinery.[77]

§ 345. Extraterritorial and Retroactive Effect

Statutes modifying or abrogating the common-law fellow-servant doctrine are ordinarily denied an extraterritorial or retroactive effect.

Statutes abrogating or modifying the common-law fellow-servant rule have no extraterritorial effect and consequently do not create a right of action for an injury sustained by a servant in another state through the negligence of a fellow servant.[78] Also the statutes do not apply to injuries received prior to the time of their taking effect,[79] but, where the injuries were received after the passage of the act, the statute applies, although the contract of employment antedated the act.[80] It has been held that the repeal of the statute will not affect an action for injuries which occurred while it was in force.[81]

§ 346. Railroad Employees

The courts have upheld the validity of constitutional and statutory provisions changing the fellow-servant doctrine in respect of railroads, and under such provisions railroad employees are entitled to recover for injuries caused by the negligence of a fellow servant in a case falling within the terms of the particular provision invoked.

The courts have upheld the validity of statutory provisions modifying or abrogating the common-law fellow-servant doctrine in respect of railroads.[82] A statute which is made to apply to employers of five or more persons engaged in business, trade, or commerce, has been held to apply to railroads, although there was already in force a statute fixing the liability of railroads to their employees.[83] Under statutes modifying or abrogating the fellow-servant doctrine and generally or specifically applicable to railroads, recovery may be had against a railroad for injuries to its employees caused by the negligence of a fellow servant.[84]

A state constitutional provision abolishing the fellow servant rule with respect to a railroad employee is not in conflict with the federal constitution or its amendments.[85] A constitutional provision abrogating the fellow-servant doctrine with regard to certain employments does not limit the power of the legislature to make further abrogation with respect to employees of railroads.[86]

§ 347. —— Employers Affected by Statutes

a. In general
b. Logging or mining roads
c. Street railroads

a. In General

Some statutes abrogating or modifying the fellow-servant doctrine have been held applicable irrespective of whether the railroad company was public or private in character while other statutes have been held inapplicable to private railroad companies.

Statutes relating to liability of railroad companies for injuries caused by fellow servants do not apply to companies in no way engaged in railroading,[87] or to employees of corporations not operating the classes of railroads described in the statute,[88] and the question precisely what employers are included within such statutes will depend on their particular provisions as construed in the light of the purpose of the act and the circumstances of the Act of employee as act of master

In personal injury action against railroad by engine hostler alleging defendant's negligence in permitting coal to remain in passageway between tracks near roundhouse, act of other employees in leaving coal in passageway was that of master under Federal Employers' Liability Act.—Tash v. St. Louis-San Francisco Ry. Co., 76 S.W.2d 690, 335 Mo. 1148.

Anticipation of injury

In order to render railroad liable for negligence of servant's fellow servant, it was not necessary that fellow servant should have anticipated injury to servant's eye would result therefrom.—Hogue v. St. Louis-San Francisco Ry. Co., Mo.App., 20 S.W.2d 301.

Knowledge of injured employee

Although Employer's Liability Act does not deprive employer of defense of assumption of risk, where injury is result of negligent acts of fellow servant of which injured employee had knowledge, neither does injured employee assume risk of injury from negligence of fellow servant of which he did not have knowledge and did not appreciate.—Chicago, R. "Railroading"

The term in statute relating to personal injury actions means business of common carrier transporting persons and goods for hire.—Fruit Growers' Express Co. v. Norton, 116 So. 234, 95 Fla. 429.

case.[89] Some statutes have been held applicable irrespective of whether the railroad was public or private in character,[90] while other statutes have been held inapplicable to private railroads.[91] In some states such statutes have been held not to apply to persons or companies engaged in the construction of railways,[92] although the contrary view is held under other statutes.[93]

Railroads in hands of receivers or trustees. In a number of states the statutes making railroad companies liable for injuries to a servant from the negligence of a fellow servant have been held to apply to railroad companies operated by receivers,[94] or trustees in charge under a deed for the benefit of creditors.[95] In other states the contrary view is maintained,[96] although the receiver was appointed on the company's own petition.[97] These latter decisions have been based on the principle that special statutes which relate expressly and exclusively to railroad companies cannot be held applicable to receivers of a railroad operating it under the orders of a court, for the reason that such receivers are not themselves railroad companies.[98]

The Federal Employers' Liability Act abrogates the fellow-servant doctrine as to railroads engaged in interstate commerce,[99] but is restricted to common carriers engaged in commerce,[1] and does not include a railroad merely owning an office building and operating an elevator therein.[2]

b. Logging or Mining Roads

Some statutes changing the fellow servant doctrine as to railroads have been held applicable to logging and mining roads, but others have been held inapplicable.

While the statutes of some states have been held not to apply to railroads used in connection with the logging or lumber business,[3] or in the operation of mines,[4] it is generally held that the dangers and hazards incident to the use of such roads are of the sort contemplated by the statute and that the operation of logging or lumber roads,[5] or of roads used in the business of mining,[6] is within the purview of such statutes.

Purpose of statute
Purpose of statute modifying fellow-servant doctrine as applied to injured employee of logging railroad is to protect employees in railroad operations, or in work, service, or employment reasonably incidental thereto.—Gurganous v. Camp Mfg. Co., 168 S.E. 833, 204 N.C. 525.

Use or dismantling of skidder
(1) Where injured employee of lumber company was employed, under supervision of skidder foreman, as drum operator on skidder, and drums were operated by stationary steam engine on the skidder which was located on tracks and could be moved from place to place, employee was held within statute abolishing fellow-servant rule as to employee of railroad or other corporation using engines or cars propelled by steam or lever power and running on tracks. —Edward Hines Lumber Co. v. Harriel, 158 So. 146, 171 Miss. 670.
(2) On the other hand, the fellow-servant rule is not abrogated as to servants of common employer dismantling skidder, not being operated at time of injury, caused by assault of one servant on another, and master is not liable where he was not negligent.—Great Southern Lumber Co. v. May, 103 So. 363, 138 Miss. 27.

Fellow-servant doctrine was held inapplicable under statute to mine railroad worker's suit for injuries because the injury occurred in the operation of a mine.—Gray v. Doe Run Lead Co., 53 S.W.2d 877, 331 Mo. 481.

c. Street Railroads

Some statutes changing the fellow-servant rule as to railroads operate to change it as to street railroads, but others have been held not applicable to them.

In some states street railroad companies are not deemed to be within the scope of statutes modifying or abrogating the fellow-servant doctrine in respect of railroad corporations or railroad employees,[7] while in other states the contrary view is held.[8]

Elevated trains; subways. An elevated railway company operating in a subway has been held not to constitute a "railroad" within the provisions of a statute relating to railroads.[9] A statute modifying the fellow-servant doctrine as to employees of elevated trains does not apply to surface cars connecting with such trains on the elevated structure.[10]

Under some statutory provisions railroads are held liable for injuries caused to a railroad employee by the negligence of a superior servant.

In several of the states the superior servant rule which had been adopted in some of the states before the enactment of any statutes, as discussed supra § 332, has been applied in whole or in part to railroad employees under constitutional or statutory provisions.[11] The test of whether a servant is a superior servant within such provisions is not the power to hire and discharge.[12] It is not necessary that the negligent servant shall have been in charge or control of the injured servant if in fact the former was in charge or control of other servants,[13] and the negligent servant may be in charge or control under the statute, although he himself is subject to the control of another.[14] A servant with authority to direct does not lose his status of a superior by performing an act of manual labor pursuant to, and in furtherance of, his orders,[15] but he may lose such status and become a mere fellow servant where at the time of injury he was engaged as a volunteer in helping the injured employee in a matter unconnected with his usual supervisory work.[16]

The following have been held superior servants within such provisions so as to make the master liable for their negligence: Engine foreman;[17] foreman of switching crew;[18] foreman of section gang;[19] section master as to farmer in temporary employ of railroad as a section hand;[20] track foreman as to members of repair gang;[21] foreman of a train crew in directing a brakeman to arrange cars for coupling;[22] foreman of construction work on bridge;[23] railroad fireman as to boiler maker;[24] mill carpenter as to his helpers;[25] conductor and engineer where brakeman is injured;[26] conductor and train dispatcher as to fireman;[27] conductor of a railroad train as to an engineer;[28] conductor as to brakeman;[29] conductor as to fireman;[30] conductor as to master mechanic riding on locomotive;[31] conductor of street car as to motorman;[32] engineer where locomotive fireman is injured;[33] engineer as

On the other hand, the following employees have been held not superior servants or officers: Carpenter engaged with laborers in setting posts along a railroad who works under the direction of foreman in charge of the work;[39] temporary foreman of switching crew who had no authority to command the switchman to pursue any particular line of action;[40] members of train crew setting cars on spur track as to brakeman injured on another passing train;[41] telegraph operator as to engineer;[42] station agent as to freight brakeman;[43] engineer as to flagman;[44] conductor removing trolley pole from current wire as to motorman;[45] engineer acting without orders from the conductor as to car coupler acting under the latter's orders;[46] and conductor having no authority over the injured engineer in matters affecting the engine.[47]

§ 349. —— Common Service Statutes

Under some statutes a railroad is liable for injuries to an employee caused by the negligence of another employee who is not engaged in a common service within the meaning of the statute and therefore not to be regarded as a fellow servant under such statutory provisions.

The effect of statutes providing that all railroad employees in the same grade of employment and who are working together at the same time and place and to a common purpose, none being intrusted with the power to control employees, are fellow servants, provided they are in the same department or branch of service, is to limit the risk assumed by an employee because of acts or omissions of others in the service of the same employer to the neglect of those who are fellow servants within the meaning of the statute, and to impose on the master liability for injuries suffered through neglect of all other fellow employees in the discharge of their duties.[48] In order to be fellow servants under statutes of this character, employees must be: (1) Engaged in the common service.[49] (2) In the same grade of employment.[50] (3) Working at substantially the same time and place.[51] (4) Working to a common purpose.[52] Under some statutory provisions it has also been held that employees must be engaged on the same piece of work[53] and doing the same character of work or service.[54]

Under such statutory provisions the following have been held fellow servants: Hostler and boiler washer, both under the orders of the roundhouse foreman;[55] engineer and switchman, members of the same switching crew working under a common foreman;[56] employees engaged in the common work of cleaning an engine;[57] station telegraph operator and locomotive engineer;[58] conductors of switch engines in the same yard engaged in moving cars

Where not defined by statute it has been held that "departments" and "branches of service" should not be so limited as merely to embrace those large divisions created for convenience in administering the affairs of the company, but that they relate to those minute ones which concern the daily duties of the employee.

The different-department rule which, independent of statute, has been rejected in some jurisdictions under principles discussed supra § 331, has been expressly adopted by statute in several of the states as to railway employees.[81] The term "different department or branch of service" has been used without defining what shall be deemed a different department or branch of service, and hence it must be determined on principles analogous to those laid down in cases where the departmental limitation has been adopted and applied independent of statute or constitution.[82] It has been held that "departments" and "branches of service" should not be so limited as merely to embrace those large divisions created for convenience in administering the affairs of the company, but that they relate to those minute ones which concern the daily duties of the employee.[83]

An engineer and a brakeman on the same train are considered to be in the same department,[84] while, on the other hand, an engineer on one train is in a different department from the brakeman on another train.[85] So also the following employees have been held to be in different departments or branches of service: A yard helper and an engineer who were engaged in operating locomotives;[86] a switch tender and the conductor and engineer of a yard engine;[87] employees in locomotive and train depart-

Under some statutes recovery may be had against a railroad for injuries to an employee caused by the negligence of another employee to whose orders the injured employee was bound to conform and did conform.

Under some statutes liability is imposed on railroad corporations, as well as on other corporations, for injuries resulting from the negligence of any persons in its service to whose order the injured employee at the time of the injury was bound to conform, and did conform.[93] Such a statute applies only to such railroad employees as are in the course of their employment exposed to the particular hazards incident to the use and operation of engines and trains, and whose injuries are caused thereby.[94] Under such statutes there can be no recovery unless the injured employee is acting under some special order in respect of the particular service in which he was engaged when injured,[95] and the injury must be caused by the negligence of such superior servant.[96]

§ 352. —— Acts or Omissions in Obedience to Rules

Under statutes making a railroad liable for injuries to its employees caused by obedience to rules, it may not be held responsible for those caused by disobedience.

A statutory provision making the master liable where the injury results from the act of omission of any person done or made in obedience to any rule, regulation, or by-law of the corporation, or in obedience to the particular instructions given by any person delegated with the authority of the corporation in that behalf, does not make the master liable where a duty is enjoined by rule, etc., on a servant and the duty is neglected or negligently performed.[97] The duty of a railroad employee to obey the orders of a superior servant does not depend, within the contemplation of the federal employers' liability act, on whether the employee violating the rule knew, or reasonably should have known, that disobedience might be dangerous to a fellow employee.[98]

§ 353. —— Negligence of Employee at Time Acting in Place and Performing Duty of Corporation

Under some statutes a railroad may be held responsible for injuries to an employee resulting from negligence of another employee acting in the place and performing the duty of the railroad corporation.

Under the provisions of some statutes, a railroad is liable for injury to its employees where caused by the negligence of a fellow servant engaged in the same common service, where the negligent servant is at the time acting in the place and performing the duty of the corporation.[99]

an employer may be held liable for injuries to its employees caused by the negligence of particular railroad employees designated in the statute,[1] such as those in charge of cars,[2] engines, as discussed infra subdivision b of this section, signals,[3] switches,[4] switch yards,[5] tracks,[6] or trains, as considered infra subdivision c of this section. These statutes are generally held not to apply to street railroads.[7]

In order to recover under such a statute the injured employee must prove that he was employed in or about a railroad,[8] and that the employee whose negligence is complained of was in charge of an engine, car, train, place, or device designated in the statute,[9] and the injuries must have been caused by a hazard involved in train operations,[10] although the statute applies to an employee injured through the negligence of other employees in the operation of a train, although he was not employed to assist in the operation of a train and was not so engaged at the time of the injury,[11] provided he was engaged in a duty connected with the operation of a railroad.[12]

An employee may recover under such a provision without showing that he was acting at the time under the direction of his superior,[13] and even though he was of superior rank to the employee whose negligence allegedly caused the injury.[14] The railroad company is liable thereunder, although no gross or willful negligence is shown,[15] and without regard to the company having used due care in selecting its employees,[16] but it must be shown that the employee whose negligence is alleged as the cause of the injury was negligent in the performance of his duty.[17]

b. Employees in Charge of Engines

In order to recover under constitutional or statutory provisions making railroads liable for injuries caused by the negligence of an engineer or other person in charge of an engine, it must be shown that both the person and the instrumentality were within the contemplation of the provision.

Under some constitutional or statutory provisions an employer may be held liable for injuries to railroad employees caused by the negligence of an engineer or other person in charge of an engine.[18]

In order to establish a case under such a provision for injuries suffered by any employee through the negligence of any person in charge of a locomotive, it must appear that the case is within its terms and that the negligence complained of was the negligence of a servant who in the line of his employment had charge of the locomotive.[19] The engineer

"Conductor" distinguished from "foreman"

Under statutes providing that every railroad shall be liable for injuries to an employee occurring without his contributory negligence where such injury was caused by the negligence of specified employees, including a "conductor," it has been said that: "It could not be sincerely claimed that the word 'conductor' can be applied to the foreman of a section gang or a bridge crew, because he merely conducts or manages the work, or that it can be applied to any other conductor than the one who manages the railroad train."—Reinke v. usually is the employee in charge of the engine,[20] although a fireman may be,[21] and a hostler may assume such charge as to make the company liable under the statute.[22] Two employees cannot be in control of an engine at the same time.[23]

A pile driver[24] and a stationary engine[25] have been held not to be within the purview of the statute. Where the statute refers to an engine upon the railroad, it does not include an engine which is stalled in a roundhouse for the purpose of repairs.[26]

c. Employees in Charge of Trains

Under some constitutional or statutory provisions an employer may be held liable for injuries to railroad employees caused by the negligence of the conductor or other person in charge or control of a train.

Under some constitutional or statutory provisions recovery may be had against a railroad for injuries to its employees caused by the negligence of an employee in charge or control of a train.[27] The words "charge" or "control" have not been defined, although it would seem they are not intended to mean different things, but are to be regarded, while not perhaps synonymous, as explanatory of each other, and used together, as describing more fully one and the same thing.[28] It is the charge or control of the train as a connected whole which is meant, rather than the charge or control of portions which together form a whole.[29] A person is in charge or control where for the time being at least he has immediate authority to direct the movements and management of the train as a whole and of the men engaged upon it.[30] It is not necessary that he should be actually upon the train itself,[31] and more than one person may have "charge or control" of a train at the same time.[32]

The conductor is usually an employee in charge of a train,[33] and the same is true of an engineer.[34] Under certain circumstances, however, a brakeman may be in control of a train,[35] and it has been held that a yardmaster whose right to control and cause the moving of cars in the yard is exclusive and whose orders to the switching crew are obeyed is in control of a train within the statute.[36] On the other hand, the foreman of a switching gang,[37] a station agent,[38] a towerman,[39] and employees making up trains[40] have been held not in charge or control of a train.

What constitutes a train. The courts have refused to define what, under all circumstances, will constitute a train within the meaning of the statute.[41] It has been said, however, that a locomotive with one or more cars attached to it, with or without passengers or freight, in motion upon a railroad from one point to another, by means of power furnished by the locomotive, constitutes a "train."[42] The term generally signifies cars in motion,[43] with power furnished by a locomotive,[44] although a train does not cease to be such when moving by its own momentum after the power is shut off from the locomotive.[45]

§ 355. —— Statutes as Applicable to All Injured Employees

a. In general
b. Employees operating railroad
c. Employees operating cars, locomotives, or trains
d. Federal Employers' Liability Act

a. In General

Under some constitutional or statutory provisions the fellow-servant rule is substantially abrogated as to all railroad employees, but under other provisions abrogation of such rule is restricted to certain employees, such as those at the time of the accident engaged in the use and operation of a railroad, or injured through negligence arising from its use and operation or from hazards peculiar to railroading.

In some of the states the fellow-servant rule is practically abrogated by statutory or constitutional provisions as far as railroad employees are concerned.[46] While all employees of a railroad company seem to be within the protection of some of the provisions,[47] and an injured employee is entitled to recover whether or not his injuries are connected with the running of trains,[48] and notwithstanding his engagement in the business is not immediately connected with running and operating the company's train,[49] other provisions, although broad enough to include all injured employees of a railroad, have been limited by judicial construction to injured employees engaged in work at the time of the accident which exposes them to some element of hazard or condition of danger peculiar to railroads.[50] Under such a provision a railroad may be held liable for injuries to an employee who is vice principal to the employee injuring him, provided the negligence of the subordinate caused his injury;[51] but if the injury is caused while the subordinate is acting, without negligence, under the orders and directions of his superior, then there is no negligence for which the company will be liable, because in such case the negligence is that of the vice principal himself.[52]

Under the express provisions of some statutes the negligence must be connected with the use and operation of a railway,[53] or with the movement of a train or engine,[54] or the movement of machinery on the track.[55] The accident must grow out of the use and operation of the road.[56] In order to authorize a recovery under such provisions, the employee must show that he belonged to the class of employees to whom the statute affords a remedy, and that the act which occasioned the injury was one of the class of acts for which a remedy is given.[57] However, the negligent employee need not be one actually upon the train,[58] and the injured employee, in order to be entitled to recover, need not be employed in the operation of the road if he is injured by its operation,[59] it being sufficient that he is engaged in work exposing him to the dangers peculiar to the operation of a railroad[60] at the time of the accident.[61]

The applicability of such a statute to an employee depends on the nature of the hazards to which he is actually exposed, and not of those which may have been contemplated in his employment.[62] Thus his

Similarity to Federal Employers' Liability Act

(1) Railroad is liable to employee injured by coemployee's negligence under statute, provisions of which are similar to those of Federal Employers' Liability Act.—Stritzke v. Chicago Great Western Ry. Co., 251 N.W. 532, 190 Minn. 323.

(2) Work of railway company's supply man in checking engine tools held so closely related to transportation as to be part thereof and authorize recovery from company for injuries to him because of engine hostler's negligence under state statutes similar to federal act and providing broadly for recovery against railroads engaged in commerce within state for injuries to employees caused, inter alia, by negligence of officers, agents, or employees of railroad.—Chesapeake & O. employment need not be connected with the running of trains where it requires him to go thereon.[63] An employee of the company, when in the performance of any matters connected with the operation of the railway, is within the protection of the statute, regardless of whether the duty neglected is magisterial in character or otherwise,[64] and the company may be liable although the negligent servant was under the control of the injured servant.[65]

Particular employees and injuries. Under the rules limiting recovery for injuries occasioned by the negligence of a fellow servant to those cases in which the injured employee is at the time of the accident engaged in work exposing him to a hazard peculiar to railroads, or wherein the negligence is connected with the use and operation of a railroad, among those held entitled to recover are: Foreman of repair gang;[66] sectionman,[67] such as one engaged in repairing the track[68] or in propelling or riding on a hand car or taking it from the track;[69] laborer on construction train who rides on the train;[70] laborer loading car of dirt train where injured by fall of impending bank;[71] shoveler unloading gravel from a gravel car;[72] employee whose duty it is to ride on train and remove snow obstructions as encountered;[73] employee operating ditching machine carried on car and worked by movement of car;[74] detective walking along track to discover persons guilty of obstructing it and injured by being run into by engine while insensible on the track;[75] car repairer or cleaner working on car standing on sidetrack;[76] and a car inspector.[77] Also those held entitled to recover include an employee unloading freight trains;[78] employee unloading, from car used in transportation, lumber from old bridge;[79] employee unloading ties to be used in repairing of tracks;[80] employees loading and unloading car by means of cable,[81] skids,[82] locomotive,[83] or a steam loader;[84] employee standing between track and warehouse, working on warehouse, and injured by moving train;[85] yard employee injured while stepping from platform to top of passing car;[86] coal handlers while coaling a standing engine;[87] fireman sorting and discarding waste material from the coal while firing engine;[88] employee whose business it is to remove ashes and fire from locomotives, to supply them with water and sand, and to aid in moving engine tanks in the railroad yard;[89] roundhouse employee putting an engine in condition for use;[90] roundhouse wiper, injured while assisting in coaling an engine, by the negligent moving of the engine by a coemployee;[91] wiper employed in roundhouse injured while assisting in straightening a cable used to pull a plow in unloading gravel from cars in repairing the track;[92] employee in railroad shop engaged in moving brake beam in shop to roundhouse;[93] member of a railroad bridge crew working on a railroad trestle unloading piling from a car;[94] and an employee building a retaining wall along an embankment, where injured by the negligence of employees in operating trains.[95] Where the negligence is that of a locomotive fireman,[96] or a wiper in charge of an engine,[97] or one intrusted with the duty of inspecting and repairing a bridge[98] it is the negligence of a servant connected with the use and operation of the railroad.

On the other hand, employees not engaged in the operation of the road or subject to the hazards peculiar to railroading have been held to include roundhouse employees;[99] employees merely loading cars;[1] laborers pushing tram cars into shop;[2] lumber manufacturer employee engaged in dismantling plant and transporting it over a spur track;[3] workmen employed in the machine shop;[4] members of a construction gang injured by the negligence of another of the crew;[5] stone mason working around depot and injured by falling of curbstone;[6] employee injured by falling of loose coal while standing on tender of engine;[7] bridge repairers;[8] blacksmith for a force engaged in building bridges for the construction of a railroad;[9] boiler maker;[10] and pitman engaged in operating steam shovel in a gravel pit and injured in the course of the work.[11]

b. Employees Operating Railroad

Statutes making a railroad liable for injuries to an employee caused by the negligence of a fellow servant "while engaged in the work of operating" has been held to include those engaged in all work that is directly necessary for running trains over a track.

Under some statutes the master is liable for all damages sustained by any agent or servant thereof "while engaged in the work of operating such railroad," by reason of the negligence of any other agent or servant thereof.[12] Such a statute is not limited to employees actually engaged in the movement of trains, cars, or locomotives upon a track, but includes those engaged in all work that is directly necessary for running trains over a track.[13] Such statutory provisions have been held to include a car repairer doing repair work on cars in repair yard;[14] carpenter engaged in building coal chute in railroad yard;[15] carpenter repairing box car;[16] employee engaged in work of loading freight car[17] or unloading ties from wagon to roadbed;[18] lineman moving electric wires used to operate street railway cars;[19] members of section crew working together;[20] section hand assisting and repairing track on railroad;[21] section hand riding on a hand car;[22] operator of rail-bending machine in repair shop;[23] switchman injured by negligence of switch tender;[24] and

c. Employees Operating Cars, Locomotives, or Trains

Under some statutory provisions a railroad is liable for injuries caused its employee by the negligence of another employee where the injured servant was at the time engaged in operating cars, locomotives, or trains.

Under some statutes a railroad company is liable for all damages sustained by any servant while engaged in the work of operating cars, locomotives, or trains, by reason of the negligence of a fellow servant.[26] The protection against the negligence of a fellow servant under such a statute is not given those employed to operate a car, locomotive, or train, but to those who at the time of injury are actually engaged in the act or work of such operation.[27] However, the word "operating" does not require that the car shall be actually moving at the time[28] or that the injured employee shall at the particular time be actively engaged in the performance of manual or other labor.[29] Such a statute is not limited to train crews, but includes a switchman employed in coupling cars while the train is being made up in the yard[30] and employees operating locomotives in yards, at stations, roundhouses, or coal chutes.[31] An employee is not engaged in "operating" while on his way to take charge of a locomotive.[32] Merely loading or unloading a car is not "operating" it,[33] although if the employee not only loads and unloads, but also works in connection with the transfer of the car to another place, he is engaged in operating it.[34] The operation of cars includes hand cars,[35] tram cars,[36] and push cars.[37] Placing a hand car on the track is operating it,[38] as are putting it in motion[39] and removing it from the track.[40]

d. Federal Employers' Liability Act

The Federal Employers' Liability Act abrogates the common-law fellow-servant doctrine as to railroad employees within the purview of the statute.

The Federal Employers' Liability Act abrogates the common-law fellow-servant rule as to railroad employees within its provisions[41] and makes the carrier liable for injuries resulting in whole or in part

Recrudescence of doctrine under different label

The theory that a servant is completely barred from recovery for injuries resulting from his master's negligence, which legislatures have sought to eliminate in all its various forms of contributory negligence, the fellow-servant rule, and assumption of risk, must not, contrary to the will of congress, be allowed recrudescence under any other label in common-law lexicon.—Tiller v. Negligence of two fellow servants

In employee's action against railroad under the act for injuries allegedly resulting from negligence of two fellow servants, whether injuries were caused by negligence of one fellow servant or by both of them did not affect railroad's liability.—Southern Ry. Co. v. Heaton, 6 S.E. 2d 339, 61 Ga.App. 386.

43. Mont.—Burnett v. Northern Pac. Ry. Co., 124 P.2d 307, 113 Mont. 253.

39 C.J. p 675 note 25.

Willful acts

(1) It has been held that the word "negligence," as used in the act, includes a deliberate and intentional injury of an employee by another employee of equal station.—Steeley v. Kurn, 157 S.W.2d 212, 384 Mo. 1142.

(2) It has also been held that the act of a foreman in brushing against a railroad laborer, although willful and intentional and amounting to assault, was negligence within the act, rendering the railroad liable for resulting injury.—Baker v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., 39 S.W.2d 535, 327 Mo. 986.

(3) On the other hand, there is authority to the effect that recovery cannot be had under the act for "willful injury," but only for negligence.—Southwell v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co., 131 S.E. 670, 191 N.C. 153, reversed on other grounds 48 S.Ct. 25, 275 U.S. 64, 72 L.Ed. 157.

Conditions at time of accident

Negligence of workmen in violently shoving motor car forward without warning, knocking down foreman as he stepped back over rail while helping place car on track, must be determined by conditions as they appeared to workmen at the time.—Jones v. St. Louis-San Francisco Ry. Co., 63 S.W.2d 94, 333 Mo. 802.

Knowledge of circumstances

In determining whether railroad was guilty of negligence rendering it liable for death of engineer fatally injured in collision between engines, the engineer's fireman, who was an experienced railroad man accustomed to the run involved, was chargeable with knowledge of all pertinent circumstances.—Bowser v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., C.C.A.Pa., 152 F.2d 436.

Duty to warn

(1) Fellow servant is not required to give warning until he knows or has reason to believe that coemployee is oblivious of situation.—Southern Ry. Co. v. Wilmouth, 153 S.E. 874, 154 Va. 582, certiorari denied Wilmouth v. Southern Ry. Corporation, 51 S.Ct. 81, 282 U.S. 878, 75 L. Ed. 775.

(2) Railroad was held as matter of law not liable for death of experienced head brakeman familiar with road who fell from bridge over creek when alighting from engine as against contention that engineer had duty to warn brakeman of danger.—Yazoo & M. V. R. Co. v. Sudduth, 157 So. 527, 171 Miss. 619, certiorari denied Sudduth v. Yazoo & M. V. R. Co., 55 S.Ct. 827, 295 U.S. 748, 79 L.Ed. 1693.

Foreman's obligations

(1) Foreman of bridge repair crew, as vice principal, was bound to see that tools were carefully loaded on railroad motor car.—Clift v. St. Louis-San Francisco Ry. Co., 9 S.W.2d 972, 320 Mo. 791.

(2) One operating a railroad motor car under the direct supervision of section foreman was entitled to rely on and obey a signal given by foreman as between himself and such foreman, particularly when foreman was occupying a more advantageous position to see and determine whether motor car could safely pass ahead of approaching truck and operator was looking at and operating the controls.—Gulf, M. & O. R. Co. v. Joiner, Miss., 29 So.2d 255.

Negligence of fellow servants shown in the course of his employment[44] or was authorized or directed by the master.[45] Recovery may be denied where the acts of the fellow servant were prompted by personal motives not connected with his employment,[46] as in the case of horseplay,[47] skylarking,[48] or a willful assault not connected with the railroad's business.[49] Where there is no showing that a railroad negligently employed a dangerous man with notice of his proclivities, an employee injured in an assault by his fellow servant cannot successfully claim that he should recover for failure of the railroad to furnish a safe place to work.[50]

(2) Failure to slacken speed when traveling over known defective track.—Chesapeake & O. Ry. Co. v. Russo, 163 N.E. 283, 91 Ind.App. 648, certiorari denied 51 S.Ct. 25, 282 U.S. 846, 75 L.Ed. 750.

(3) Failure of driver of motorized hand car to keep lookout.—McPherson v. Thompson, Mo.App., 164 S.W. 2d 80, certiorari denied Thompson v. McPherson, 63 S.Ct. 769, 318 U.S. 773, 87 L.Ed. 1143.

(4) Violation of known custom or duty.—Matthews v. Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co., 129 P.2d 435, 54 Cal. App.2d 549.

(1) Generally.—Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Davis, 186 S.W.2d 20, 208 Ark. 86.

(2) Act in sudden emergency.—Fort Worth & D. C. Ry. Co. v. Williams, Tex.Civ.App., 275 S.W. 415, certiorari denied 46 S.Ct. 356, 270 U. S. 661, 70 L.Ed. 786.

(3) Obedience to rules by fellow servants constitutes exercise of due care on their part.—Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Ballard, C.C.A.Tex., 108 F.2d 768, rehearing denied 109 F.2d 1012, certiorari denied Ballard v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co., 60 S.Ct. 1096, 310 U.S. 646, 84 L.Ed. 1413.

Act as mere volunteer cannot render railroad liable for injuries claimed to have been caused by a fellow servant.—Smith v. Southern Pac. Co., 277 P. 609, 51 Nev. 390.

Apparent authority

Railroad agents are confined to particular duties, and their authority does not extend beyond apparent authority unless greater authority is shown.—Smith v. Southern Pac. Co., supra.

Test of master's liability to injured servant for a fellow servant's act is the fellow servant's purpose to further the master's business.—Sheaf v. Minneapolis, St. P. & S. S. M. R. Co., C.C.A.N.D., 162 F.2d 110.

Authority for particular act

In order to hold master liable for servant's act, servant need not have authority to do particular act, but it must be done within scope of his general authority in furtherance of master's business.—Texas & N. O. R. Co. v. Webster, Civ.App., 53 S.W. 2d 656, affirmed 70 S.W.2d 394, 123 Tex. 197, certiorari denied 55 S.Ct. 93, 293 U.S. 580, 79 L.Ed. 677, rehearing denied 55 S.Ct. 138, 293 U. Ratification not shown

A railroad company did not ratify the act of an engineer in attacking a conductor by retaining him in its service where, in making the attack, the engineer did not assume to be acting for or on behalf of the railroad, and it was not charged with having received any benefit from the assault.—Sheaf v. Minneapolis, St. P. & S. S. M. R. Co., C.C.A.N.D., 162 F. 2d 110.

Employees in separate departments

(1) A member of interstate switching crew could not recover from railroad under the act for injuries received when messenger employed by railroad assaulted crew member while engaged in rough horseplay, where crew member and messenger were in separate departments and had no business together, and assault did not occur in course of messenger's employment, and was not in furtherance of railroad's business and was unauthorized and not directed by railroad.—Osment v. Pitcairn, supra.

(2) A special policeman in railroad's special service department, having knowledge of propensity of messenger for rough horseplay and failing to stop messenger who engaged in horseplay on switchman, did not thereby render railroad liable under the act for injuries sustained by switchman, notwithstanding railroad voluntarily created special service department, and that policeman's failure to act may have been proximate cause of switchman's injuries, where messenger was acting outside scope of his employment.—Osment v. Pitcairn, supra.

Slipping on ice

Where railroad trackman, whose cap was pulled over his eyes by fellow employee engaged in "skylarking," slipped on icy tie and fractured his spine, employer was not liable under the act, as fellow employee's act was not done in course of duty.—Popadines v. Davis, supra.

49. U.S.—Sheaf v. Minneapolis, St. P. & S. S. M. R. Co., C.C.A.N.D., 162 F.2d 110.
39 C.J. p 675 note 26 [a].

Although regarded as negligence, rather than trespass, fellow servant's unprovoked assault on railroad employee did not render railroad liable for resultant injury unless aggressor was, at time of assault, acting within scope of his employment.—Sheaf v. Minneapolis, St. P. & S. S. M. R. Co., supra.

Assault by section foreman

(1) Under the act, an interstate railroad carrier is not liable for assault by a section foreman on member of section crew unless the assault was committed within scope of foreman's employment or under direction or authorization of carrier.—Bocian v. Union Pac. R. Co., 289 N. W. 372, 137 Neb. 318.

(2) In such a case, the law that permits a conductor on a passenger car to make a reasonable assault on a dangerous person, when necessary for protection of passengers on train, did not apply, in action against railroad under the act, to a wrongful assault by foreman of a section crew on a member thereof.—Bocian v. Union Pac. R. Co., supra.

50. N.Y.—Zoccano v. Long Island R. Co., 65 N.Y.S.2d 32.

4. Concurrent Negligence of Master and Fellow Servant

§ 356. Rules Stated and Applied

Where the negligence of the master or of his vice principal concurs with that of a fellow servant of the injured employee in causing the injury, the master is not freed from liability through the operation of the fellow-servant rule.

Where the negligence of the master or of his vice principal concurs with that of a fellow servant of the injured employee in causing the injury, the master is not freed from liability through the operation of the fellow-servant rule,[51] or, as the principle is sometimes stated, the negligence of a fellow servant will not defeat an action for an injury to the servant if it is not the sole cause thereof.[52] It is not necessary that the negligence of the master shall have been the sole cause,[53] or in itself alone the efficient cause,[54] of the injury, but it must have contributed thereto,[55] and in a number of cases the master's liability has been made to depend on whether his negligence was the proximate or remote cause of the accident.[56] Where the negligence of the master or vice principal is the proximate or efficient cause of the injury,[57] or if the injury would not have been sustained but for his negligence,[58] or where the negligence of the master and fellow servant combine to create the proximate cause,[59] or if the negligence of a fellow servant is the proximate cause of the injury but the negligence of the master is the proximate cause of the negligence of the fellow servant,[60] the master is liable; and this is true although the injury might have been prevented by the exercise of greater care on the part of the fellow servant;[61] nor will the fact that the master's negligence was slight as compared with that of the fellow servant defeat a recovery.[62] The fact that an injury to an employee would not have occurred but for a fellow servant's negligence may not relieve the master of responsibility for his concurrent negligence.[63] Where, however, the negligence of the servant is such as to have caused the injury even had the master not been negligent,[64] or where the accident results from a new or distinct cause other than the master's negligence,[65] the master is not liable.

The rule imposing liability on the master notwithstanding the concurring negligence of the fellow servant has been applied in the case of a failure in his duty to furnish competent coemployees,[66] or to furnish a sufficient number of employees,[67] or to provide and maintain a reasonably safe place to

"Assumption of risk" is a voluntary agreement by a servant or employee that certain dangers of injury arising in the course of his employment shall be at his risk.

"Assumption of risk," in the law of master and servant, is a phrase commonly used to describe a term or condition in the contract of employment, either express or implied from the circumstances of the employment, by which the employee or servant agrees that certain dangers of injury, while he is engaged in the service for which he is hired, shall be at the risk of the employee or servant.[78] "Assumption of risk" has been variously defined as the voluntary act of an ordinarily prudent man who, for hire, takes the chance of a known or obvious danger incident to his employment;[79] the voluntary contract of an ordinarily prudent servant to take the chances of the known or obvious dangers of his employment and to relieve his master of liability therefor;[80] the voluntary exposure, without remonstrance, to the ordinary hazards of the particular use of machinery or appliances, claimed by an employee to be defective or unfit, but of which conditions he knew, or must necessarily have acquired knowledge in the ordinary pursuit of his duties;[81] in effect a waiver of defects and dangers and a consent on the part of the employee to assume them, no matter whether he be careful or negligent in his conduct.[82]

It has been said that the phrase is used in a dual sense; on the one hand, it is used to indicate the employee's assumption of risks inherent in the nature of the employment without regard to negligence on either his part or that of the employer, and on the other hand, it is used to indicate a situation in which an employee with knowledge that his safety is endangered by some neglect on the part of his employer nevertheless continues to work without complaint.[83] Although circumstances justifying its application in other connections may sometimes arise, as a general rule the doctrine of assumption of risk pertains to controversies between master and servant[84] and to controversies between master and serv-

R. H. Herron Co., 169 P. 682, 684, 177 Cal. 13.

Historical development

"Assumption of risk is a judicially created rule which was developed in response to the general impulse of common law courts at the beginning of this period [the past one hundred years] to insulate the employer as much as possible from bearing the 'human overhead' which is an inevitable part of the cost—to someone—of the doing of industrialized business. The general purpose behind this development in the common law seems to have been to give maximum freedom to expanding industry."—Tiller v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co., Va., 63 S.Ct. 444, 447, 318 U.S. 54, 87 L.Ed. 610, 143 A.L.R. 967.

Necessity of negligence

(1) It has been held on the one hand that the doctrine of assumption of risk negatives the prima facie liability of the employer and does not involve the creation of the peril by the employee.—Chesapeake & O. Ry. Co. v. Richardson, C.C.A.Ohio, 116 F.2d 860, 863, certiorari denied 61 S.Ct. 961, 313 U.S. 574, 85 L.Ed. 1531.

(2) However, it has also been held that there is never any occasion for application of the doctrine unless there has been some question of original negligence on the part of the master; if the master has been free from negligence, there is no liability and the question of assumption of risk does not arise.—Knowles v. Southern Ry. Co., 12 S.E.2d 821, 177 Va. 88—Morris & Co. v. Alvis, 107 S.E. 664, 130 Va. 434.

ant exclusively,[85] and it is in this connection that the doctrine is discussed in this Title.

Voluntary action as element. In order that a risk may be assumed, it is essential that the act of the servant should be voluntary.[86]

b. Distinguished from Contributory Negligence

It has generally been held, at least by authorities holding that the doctrine of assumption of risk is based on contract, that one of the principal distinctions between that doctrine and the doctrine of contributory negligence is that the latter rests in tort while the former rests in contract; another distinction is that contributory negligence involves fault or breach of duty on the servant's part, while assumption of risk may exist without such fault.

It has frequently been stated, and with good reason, that assumption of risk and contributory negligence are so closely allied that it is sometimes difficult to draw the true line of distinction.[87] Expressions have been made to the effect that in a broad sense assumption of risk shades into contributory negligence, the difference being one of degree rather than kind;[88] and it has been declared that the point where the two concepts approximate is where the danger is so obvious and imminent that no one of ordinary prudence would encounter it.[89] Nevertheless the two concepts are by no means absolutely identical for all purposes and under all circumstances,[90] and, while the same state of facts may raise issues of assumed risk and contributory negligence[91] and even show the presence of both,[92] "contributory negligence" and "assumption of risk" are not, as ordinarily used, synonymous terms,[93] but are distinguishable.[94] Indeed, they have been held to "The common-law defenses, assumption of risk, contributory negligence, and the fellow-servant rule were originated and developed in common ground. Not entirely identical in conception, they conjoined and overlapped in many applications. The overlapping areas first concealed, then created a confusion which only served to create more; so that in time the three became more, rather than less, indistinguishable."—Owens v. Union Pac. R. "Voluntary" assumption

(1) "Voluntary" assumption of risk as distinguished from so-called "contractual" assumption of risk is closely related to contributory negligence.—Engel v. constitute entirely distinct defenses,[95] founded on distinct principles of law.[96]

Tort and contract basis as distinction. While the statement has been criticized,[97] and while, as discussed infra subdivision c of this section, it is the rule in some jurisdictions that assumption of risk is based on the principle expressed by the maxim, Volenti non fit injuria, and cannot rest on contract, it generally has been stated, as one of the principal distinctions between assumption of risk and contributory negligence, that the latter rests in tort while the former rests in contract.[98] Another view of the distinction is that, while contributory negligence involves some fault or breach of duty on the part of the employee and his failure to use such care for his safety as ordinarily prudent employees in the same circumstances would use, as discussed infra § 421, assumption of risk may exist, although the servant is entirely free from negligence,[99] and, when shown, assumption of risk constitutes a perfect defense, although the servant was free from contributory negligence,[1] or although he exercised more than ordinary care for his safety.[2]

Degree of proximity to particular harm. In distinguishing between the two concepts it has been held, following a statement by the supreme court of the United States,[3] that the practical difference between the two ideas is in the degree of their proximity to the particular harm; the preliminary conduct of getting into the dangerous employment or relation is said to be accompanied by assumption of the risk, while the act immediately leading to a specific accident is called negligent.[4]

Other distinctions between assumption of risk and contributory negligence are that the latter constitutes a breach of a legal duty imposed by law on the servant however unwilling or unprotesting he may be, while assumption of risk is not a duty, but a voluntary undertaking on the part of the servant.[5] Again, the defense of assumption of risk does not impliedly admit negligence on the part of defendant and defeat the right of action therefor as does the defense of contributory negligence.[6] So, if assumption of risk is the issue, knowledge of defective conditions, and acquiescence therein, are fatal to plaintiff's case; if contributory negligence is the issue, knowledge of defective conditions and acquiescence therein, may or may not be fatal,[7] depending on whether a person of ordinary prudence, under all the circumstances, would have done what the injured person did.[8] It has also been said that, when the injury arises from a failure to choose correctly between two ways of discharging duties imposed on the servant, one of which is safe and the other hazardous, the servant has not assumed the risk but has negligently contributed to the injury;[9] but, as discussed infra § 390, this distinction has not been very generally adhered to, many decisions holding that, where there are two or more ways in which a servant may perform his duties and he voluntarily chooses an unusual or more hazardous method, knowing it to be unsafe, he assumes the risk of injury from so doing.

c. Basis of Doctrine

Some authorities hold that the doctrine of assumption of risk is based on contract, at least as far as ordinary risks are concerned; others hold that the doctrine is based not on contract but on the principle of the maxim, Volenti non fit injuria; and some authorities hold that the doctrine is based on contract and at the same time comes within the maxim.

It is broadly stated in numerous decisions that the doctrine of assumption of risk by the servant is based on contract either express or implied, without any distinction being drawn between ordinary risks incidental to the service and that class of risks generally described as extraordinary, which are caused by the master's negligence.[10] However, in many cases discussing the basis of the doctrine the distinctions between the various kinds of risks are observed; and among such cases it is generally held that as to ordinary risks the doctrine that assumption of risks is based on contract cannot be seriously questioned, and that in the absence of express contract the law implies as a part of the contract of service that a servant agrees to assume and does assume all the ordinary risks of injury incident to the nature of the work which he has undertaken to perform;[11] and some authorities go even further

"The doctrine of assumption of risk is contractual in its nature, and rests upon an agreement of a servant with his master, ordinarily implied, that the master shall not be liable for any injury to the servant resulting from the ordinary and usual risks and perils incident to the nature of the employment."—Biskup v. Hoffman, 287 S.W. 865, 220 Mo. App. 542.
"The conception underlying the doctrine is that in contracting to perform certain work the servant as an implied part of the agreement assumes and accepts responsibility and hold that the assumption of extraordinary, as well as of ordinary, risks grows out of express or implied terms of the contract.[12] It is very generally declared that the consideration for such assumption of ordinary risks by the servant is the fixing of the compensation with respect to the risks so assumed.[13]

On the other hand, some decisions hold without qualification that the doctrine of assumption of risk does not and cannot rest on contract, but is based upon the principle expressed by the maxim, Volenti non fit injuria,[14] that is to say, on the principle that he who consents to an act will not be heard to claim that he has been injured by it.[15] Under the rule formulated by these cases the defense of assumption of risk and that of contributory negligence are equally peculiar to the law of torts and both are usually implied from conduct.[16] So, also, there is a class of decisions which, while not going so far as those just considered, hold that the assumption of extraordinary risks depends solely on the maxim, Volenti non fit injuria.[17] In still another class of decisions, the courts, while holding that assumption of risk rests on contract usually implied, further declare that the defense also comes within the maxim, Volenti non fit injuria.[18] The maxim, Volenti non fit injuria, as applied to assumption of risk, is described by some decisions as a species of waiver.[19]

Public policy. As an additional ground for imposing assumption of risks on the servant, some of the courts have held that it is a matter of public policy to impose such risks on the servants,[20] it being assumed that the servant will be more careful if he knows that he will not receive compensation for injuries received in the course of his employment;[21] but this principle has been rejected as unsound.[22]

§ 358. As a Defense in General

Although the doctrine of assumption of risk is not favored and should not be extended beyond its reasonable limits, nevertheless, where it is applicable and established it constitutes a complete bar to recovery, except in so far as its effect may be limited by statute.

Although, except where abrogated or modified by statute,[23] the defense of assumption of risk is established as a part of the law and will be applied in all cases fairly within the rule,[24] it is, nevertheless, for any bodily hurt resulting from the 'ordinary risks' incident to the work which he has agreed to perform."—Hennessy v. Ginsberg, 180 N.W. 796, 800, 46 N.D. 229.

not a favored doctrine,[25] but at best is artificial and harsh and should not be extended beyond its reasonable limits.[26] Nevertheless, except as otherwise provided by statute, where assumption of risk is established, it constitutes a complete bar to an action by the servant for injuries sustained in the course of his employment.[27]

§ 359. —— Effect of Federal Employers' Liability Act

The defense of assumption of risk is not available in any cases arising under the Federal Employers' Liability Act for the recovery of damages for injuries or death resulting from the negligence of the employer.

Under the Federal Employers' Liability Act § 4, as amended by the Act of Aug. 11, 1939, c. 685, § 1, 45 U.S.C.A. § 54, providing that in any action brought by virtue of the act the employee shall not be held to have assumed the risks of his employment in any case where such injury or death resulted in whole or in part from the negligence of any of the officers, agents, or employees of the carrier, and that no employee shall be held to have assumed the risks of his employment in any case where the violation by such carrier of any statute enacted for the safety of employees contributed to the injury or death of such employee, the doctrine of assumption of risk as a defense to negligence on the part of the carrier is eliminated,[28] and for practical purposes the only question remaining is whether or not the Disregard of ultimate ground

The effect of the doctrine of voluntary assumption of risk is to render unnecessary an analysis which might determine whether the ultimate ground of denial of recovery is absence of duty or breach of duty, want of proximate causal relation or contributory negligence.—Hietala v. carrier's negligence was the proximate cause of the injury.[29] In other words, cases under the act must be handled as though no doctrine of assumption of risk ever existed;[30] and the courts will not allow resort to hazy distinctions so as to leave the defense available under some other name or designation,[31] such as nonnegligence[32] or contributory negligence.[33] On the other hand, some courts have held that this removal of the defense in cases where the injury is due to the carrier's negligence implies that it has not been abolished in other instances.[34]

Under the Federal Employers' Liability Act §§ 1–10, 45 U.S.C.A. §§ 51–60, as it stood prior to its amendment in 1939, the defense of assumption of risk was available in actions coming within the purview of the act to the same extent as at common law except as otherwise provided in the statute,[35]

fellow servant, of which the injured person was not aware, and which an ordinarily prudent person would not have observed.[37] It was said that, inasmuch as the act specifically designated the cases to which the doctrine of assumption of risk was applicable, it clearly showed the legislative intent that in all other cases the defense of assumption of risk should have its common-law effect.[38] The defense of assumption of risk was held available in proper cases even where the master was found to have been negligent.[39] In order to render the defense available to the employer, it was essential that the statute violated should be a federal statute;[40] and the act had no application to a violation of a state statute.[41] The provisions of the Employers' Liability Act could not affect the availability of the defense of assumption of risk in an action not coming within the act.[42]

It is generally held that, as to all cases within the provision of the Federal Employers' Liability Act, all state law, common or statutory, is superseded by it, and the availability of assumption of risk as a defense in all actions by servants of railroad companies injured in interstate commerce is to be determined by the law as formulated and applied by the federal courts.[43] Hence it was held, before the amendment abolishing the defense, that, if the facts of the case were such as to render assumption of risk available as a defense under the federal statute, there could be no recovery, although the defense would not have been available under the state law.[44] However, it was also held that, where an action was brought in a state court and the defense of assumption of risk was, on a proper application of the Federal Employers' Liability Act, found to be available in the action, the common-law rule governing assumption of risk as formulated and enforced by the courts of the state in which the action is brought applies, and not the common-law rule of the federal courts.[45]

§ 360. —— Effect of State Employers' Liability Acts

Assumption of risk as affected by ever, or in instances in which the statute is not applicable, the doctrine of assumption of risk applies.[47]

2. Nature of Risks

§ 361. Extraordinary Risks; Definition

Subject to the exception of known or obvious dangers, a servant does not assume extraordinary risks, that is, risks which are not normally or usually an incident of the employment and which may be obviated by the exercise of reasonable care on the master's part.

The general rule is that the servant assumes only such risks as ordinarily are incident to the service;[48] and accordingly, in the absence of a contract providing otherwise,[49] and subject to the exception of known or obvious dangers, discussed infra §§ 379–391, extraordinary risks are not assumed by the servant.[50] This rule has been affirmed by express statutory provision in some jurisdictions,[51] and its operation and effect were not changed by the Federal Employers' Liability Act prior to the amendment of the act so as to eliminate assumption of the risks of the employment in any case where the injury or death of the employee resulted in whole or in part from the negligence of the officers, agents, or employees of the carrier.[52]

What are extraordinary risks. An extraordinary risk is not one which is uncommon or unusual in the sense that it is rare;[53] nor is the word "extraordinary" used to denote magnitude or as a mark of degree.[54] An extraordinary risk is one lying outside the sphere of the normal,[55] arising out of conditions not usual in the master's business,[56] and, in applying the doctrine of assumption of risk, one which may be obviated by the exercise of reasonable care on the master's part.[57] As discussed infra § 362, risks arising from the master's negligence are extraordinary risks; and it has been said that, as the expression "extraordinary risks" is generally used to describe "risks arising from the negligence of the master,"[58] the two terms deal with but one class of risks and, for all practical purposes, are synonymous, the difference between them being in nomenclature only.[59]

§ 362. Risks Arising from Master's Negligence

a. In general

b. Incompetency or negligence of fellow servants

a. In General

It is a general rule that a servant does not assume risks arising from the negligence of the master.

Risks which arise from the negligence of the master or those representing him are not "ordinary risks" incident to the employment,[60] but are "extra-

(6) Right of servant to rely on care of master see infra § 380.

Hazard known to employee contributing to injury
(1) If the controlling proximate cause of an injury to a servant is an independent act of negligence on the part of a master which the servant could not have avoided by ordinary danger is known or obvious, discussed infra § 382, obtains in most states, wherein it is not provided otherwise by statute, even though the risk is the result of the master's negligence, as considered infra § 384. In a few jurisdictions, however, it has been said that it is a rule, to which there is no exception,[63] that a servant never assumes a risk growing out of the negligence of the master.[64] In such jurisdictions assumption of risk is not a defense at all where the risk arises from the master's negligence;[65] and, where the master's negligence is proved or conceded, the doctrine of assumption of risk, in its technical acceptation, is eliminated from the case[66] and the servant's conduct with reference to the risk is considered only from the point of view of whether or not it is contributory negligence.[67] Also, in such jurisdictions, the only risks assumed by the servant are those which remain after the master has exercised ordinary care.[68] Indeed, in some jurisdictions it has been stated broadly,[69] or in connection with ordinary risks,[70] that the only risks assumed are those which arise or exist after the master has exercised due care in the performance of the duties which the law casts on him.

care, the master is liable, although a hazard of the employment known to the servant may have contributed to the injury.—Seaboard Air-Line R. Co. v. Witt, 60 S.E. 1012, 4 Ga.App. 149.

(2) Defects or dangers of which servant has actual or constructive knowledge generally see infra §§ 382–390.

b. Incompetency or Negligence of Fellow Servants

In the absence of a statutory rule to the contrary, as a general rule a servant assumes the risk of injury from the negligence, but not from the incompetency, of a fellow servant.

A servant does not assume the risk of injuries due to the incompetency of his fellow servants,[71] and, according to some decisions, negligence on the part of a fellow servant is not an incident[72] or ordinary risk[73] of the employment, and the risk of injury caused thereby is not assumed by the servant.[74] According to the weight of authority, however, the risk of injury from the negligence of a fellow servant is assumed by a servant[75] as one of the ordinary risks of his employment,[76] in the absence of a claim that the employer failed to exercise reasonable care in selecting the fellow servant.[77] In some jurisdictions following the majority rule it has been held that the assumption of risk of the negligence of a fellow servant is an implied term in the contract of employment,[78] but it has also been held that such risk is not assumed contractually.[79] Assumption of risk of the negligence of a coemployee of a railroad company is discussed infra § 366.

§ 363. —— Place of Work in General

It is a general rule that a servant does not assume the risk of the master's neglect of duty to furnish a reasonably safe place for work.

It has been said that assumption of risk must be considered with reference to the employer's primary duty to furnish reasonably safe surroundings.[80] The master's neglect of duty to furnish a reasonably safe place for work is not an ordinary risk of the employment,[81] and a servant does not assume the risk thereof,[82] whether the master assumes to perform the duty in person or delegates it to another,[83] unless, as considered infra § 390, the servant knew of and appreciated the risk of his failure to do so, or unless the defects and dangers due to his failure to provide a safe place of work are so open and obvious that an ordinarily prudent man under the circumstances would have observed and appreciated them, or unless the assumption of such risk is embraced in the contract of employment.[84]

Construction of place of work by servant. An exception to the rule occurs where the servant assumes the duty of constructing or preparing the place in which he works; in these circumstances the master is relieved from all liability for injuries caused by defects therein.[85]

§ 364. —— Machinery, Tools, and Appliances in General

Generally a servant does not assume the risk of injury from the negligent failure of the master to furnish him with reasonably safe machinery, tools, or appliances for the prosecution of the work he is employed to do.

A servant does not assume the risk of injury from the negligent failure of the master to furnish him with reasonably safe machinery, tools, or appliances for the prosecution of the work for which he is employed,[86] unless, as discussed infra § 390, the danger is known to him or is so open as to be readily observable by him, or by contract he voluntarily assumes the risk;[87] and in some jurisdictions it has been held that he never assumes such risk.[88] Such a risk of injury has been said not to be a risk ordinarily incident to the employment.[89] Assumption of risk of injury from a simple tool is discussed infra § 390.

§ 365. —— Mining, Quarrying, and Excavating

Ordinarily risks due to the master's negligence are not assumed by a servant engaged in mining, quarrying, or excavating.

The general rule that risks due to the master's negligence are not assumed by the servant, discussed infra § 362 a, has been applied to the work of mining, quarrying, and excavating.[90] Where it is the duty of another employee, after finding missed

§ 366. —— Operation of Railroads

a. In general
b. Negligence of fellow servant

a. In General

Generally speaking, a servant of a railroad company does not assume the risk of injury due to the negligence of the master.

Generally speaking, a servant of a railroad company does not assume the risk of injury due to the negligence of the master,[92] since such negligence is not an ordinary incident of employment by a railroad company.[93] The rule is not different under the Federal Employers' Liability Act[94] or under various state statutes.[95] The effect of statutes on the common-law exception of known or obvious risks is discussed infra § 383, the effect on such exception of noncompliance with statutes enacted for the safety of employees infra § 369, and the effect of noncompliance with statutes not designed solely for the protection of employees infra § 370.

The rule under consideration has often been applied in case of injuries sustained by reason of the master's failure of duty to provide reasonably safe cars or locomotives,[96] or hand cars,[97] bridges,[98]

b. Negligence of Fellow Servant

Ordinarily a railroad employee does not assume the risk of injury from the negligence of a coemployee or fellow servant.

Negligence on the part of a coemployee or fellow servant is not an ordinary incident of employment by a railroad company,[13] and generally the risk of injury from such negligence is not assumed by a railroad employee.[14] This is true under the Federal Employers' Liability Act[15] and under some state statutes referring expressly to railroad employees;[16] but such a state statute does not apply where the employer is not a railroad company or engaged in railroading, as where it merely builds refrigerator cars and furnishes refrigerator service to corporations engaged in railroading;[17] and, according to some authorities, a railroad employee will be held, in an action not brought under a state or federal statute, to have assumed the risk of the negligence of a fellow servant.[18]

§ 367. —— Personal Direction of Work by Master

The risk of injury from the negligence of the master who is personally supervising and directing the work is not assumed by a servant.

A servant does not assume the risk of injury from the negligence of the master while the latter is personally supervising and directing the work,[19] especially where he has been assured that he may perform the work with safety.[20]

§ 368. —— Concurrent Negligence of Master and Fellow Servant

A servant does not assume the risk of injury from the concurrent negligence of the master and a fellow servant.[21]

§ 369. —— Noncompliance with Statutory Requirements for Safety of Servant

a. Statutes expressly abrogating defense
b. Statutes not expressly abrogating defense

a. Statutes Expressly Abrogating Defense

The express provisions of some federal and state statutes preclude application of the doctrine of assumption of risk where the employer's violation of a statute enacted for the safety of employees contributed to the death or injury of an employee.

Under the Federal Employers' Liability Act § 4, 45 U.S.C.A. § 54, an employee shall not be held to have assumed the risks of his employment in any case where the violation by the common carrier of any statute enacted for the safety of employees contributed to the death or injury of the employee,[22] that is, where the carrier's violation of a federal safety act,[23] such as the Boiler Inspection Act[24]

Following unapproved method
Under a contract of employment, it is implied that employee will obey lawful rules, orders, and instructions which promote his safety, and where the employer has adopted an approved method for doing hazardous work, the burden of assumption of risk as to the method followed by other employees is removed, except as to the approved method.—Chesapeake & O. Ry. Co. v. Richardson, C.C.A.Ohio, 116 F.2d 860, certiorari denied 61 S.Ct. 961, 313 U.S. 574, 85 L.Ed. 1531.

Prior to amendment of act
The opinion was expressed in one case that, prior to the amendment of the act, the fact that the injury arose from the negligence of a fellow servant had little to do with the application of the doctrine of assumption of risk, the negligence of a fellow employee neither barring nor aiding assumption of risk.—McCrowell v. Southern Ry. Co., 20 S.E. 2d 352, 221 N.C. 336.

Where coemployee is not negligent there is no room for application of any rule as to the assumption of the risk of his negligence.

or the Safety Appliance Act,[25] contributed to the death or injury of the employee; and this is true irrespective of the employee's knowledge of the violation of the statute;[26] but the provision refers to federal, rather than state, statutes,[27] and it is not accorded effect where there has been no violation of a federal safety statute.[28] Under § 8 of the Safety Appliance Act, 45 U.S.C.A. § 7, any employee injured by any locomotive, car, or train in use contrary to the provisions of the act shall not be deemed thereby to have assumed the risk thereby occasioned, although continuing in the employment of the carrier after the unlawful use of such locomotive, car, or train had been brought to his knowledge.[29]

Under the express provision of some state statutes the defense of assumption of risk is abrogated where the master has violated the provisions of a statute in respect of duties imposed on him thereby for the safety of his servants.[30] Further, aside from these express provisions, where the statute also imposes a penalty for violation thereof, there can be no assumption of risk, it has been said, by contract, either express or implied, because a contract of this character is against public policy.[31] Where these statutes are in force, an employee cannot assume a risk consequent on his employer's neglect of the statutory duty imposed in the exercise of the police power, notwithstanding his knowledge of the master's breach of duty and the consequent danger.[32] These statutes are of no avail unless the master has violated a statute enacted for the safety of employees[33] and such violation has contributed to the injury or death of the employee.[34]

b. Statutes Not Expressly Abrogating Defense

Noncompliance by an employer with a statute requiring him to take designated precautions for the protection and safety of his employees deprives him of the defense of assumption of risk even though it is not expressly so provided by statute.

Notwithstanding some authority to the contrary,[35] the weight of authority supports the rule that, where statutes require employers to take designated precautions for the protection and safety of their employees, a noncompliance therewith operates to deprive them of the defense of assumption of risk, although the statutes contain no express provision to that effect.[36] The rule applies whether the statute takes the form of a command to furnish safe

Violation of statutes designed for appliances or is an express prohibition against furnishing unsafe or improper appliances;[37] and its operation is not affected by the fact that the noncompliance with the statute by the master[38] and the dangers resulting therefrom[39] were obvious, or that the servant had actual knowledge that the master had not complied with the statute[40] and continued to work with knowledge of such violation and an appreciation of the dangers.[41] If the rule were otherwise, the statutes would be of no effect whatever.[42] Also it has been held or recognized that the rule applies, although the servant continued to work in violation of rules promulgated by the employer in evasion of the statute,[43] or voluntarily adopted an unsafe way of work where a safe way existed.[44]

The rule has been applied in cases of noncompliance with statutory requirements to erect "tell tales" within a specified distance from the approach of an overhead bridge,[45] to equip locomotives properly with headlights,[46] to provide cars with automatic couplers,[47] to provide a safe roadbed,[48] to furnish proper fire escapes,[49] to hire competent servants,[50] to establish and maintain a code of elevator signals,[51] to furnish an efficient alarm to a train in a mine,[52] to furnish sufficient timbers for protection of minors see infra § 419.

Reason for rule is that assumption of risk is a result of the contract of employment and that it is unlawful and against public policy for parties to contract, either expressly or impliedly, to violate a statute enacted by the state in the exercise of its police power for the protection of its citizens.

§ 370. —— Noncompliance with Statutes Not Designed Solely for Protection of Servant

Public policy may forbid an employee from assuming a risk created by a violation of a statute or a rule or regulation having the effect of law.

Public policy may forbid an employee from assuming a risk created by violation of a statute or rule or regulation having the effect of law.[61] An ordinance requiring all stairs to be provided with handrails is clearly for the protection of both employees and the public rightfully in buildings and is as effective to abolish the assumption of risk as a statute would be.[62]

Statutes directed to railroad companies. It has been held that, although a statute requires railroad companies to fence their rights of way and maintain cattle guards, and provides that a noncompliance with the statute shall render a railroad company liable for all damages sustained by any person in consequence thereof, a servant who is injured by reason of a noncompliance with the statutory duty assumes the risk if he entered and continued in the service knowing that the road was not fenced;[63] but the opposite conclusion has also been reached.[64] Likewise, it has been held that statutes which prohibit the running of trains within corporate limits in excess of a designated rate of speed are intended for the benefit of employees as well as the general public, and that a servant does not assume the risk of injury for a violation of this statute where he did not know that it was customarily violated;[65] and, on the other hand, that if he does know that the statute is customarily violated he does assume the risk of injury.[66]

§ 371. Ordinary Risks

The ordinary risks of an employment are those which are normally and necessarily incident thereto, and which cannot be obviated or avoided by the exercise of due care on the part of the master.

§ 372. —— Rule as to Assumption of Such Risks

a. In general

b. Dangerous or extrahazardous character of employment

c. Maturity, experience, or infirmity of employee

a. In General

It is a general common-law rule that a servant assumes all the risks which are ordinarily incident to his employment and which are not attributable to the master's negligence.

In the absence of an agreement to the contrary,[73] and except as the rule is modified by statute,[74] a servant by his contract of employment, either expressly or impliedly from the circumstances of the employment, agrees to assume all the risks ordinarily or obviously incident to the discharge of his duties in the particular employment[75] and which are cidents of employment see supra §§ 362–366.

resulting from a risk so assumed.[77] It will be presumed that the contract was made with reference to such risks.[78] The servant's assumption of such risks is in the nature of things a part of his employment, and the employer violates no legal duty to the employee in failing to protect him from dangers which cannot be escaped by anyone doing such work.[79] However, the doctrine that a servant assumes the ordinary and usual risks of his employment is not favored and should not be extended beyond its reasonable limits.[80]

b. Dangerous or Extrahazardous Character of Employment

The rule as to the servant's assumption of risks ordinarily incident to his employment applies notwithstanding the employment is of a dangerous character or the work is of a peculiarly hazardous character.

The general rule that the servant assumes the risks ordinarily incident to his employment, discussed supra subdivision a of this section, applies whether the employment is[81] or whether the employment is not[82] of a dangerous or hazardous character, or even though the work is of a peculiarly hazardous character.[83] The dangerous nature of the service adds nothing to the liability of the master.[84] As applied to plain and obvious dangers connected with the place of work, the rule is said to constitute an exception to the rule discussed supra § 202, requiring the master to use ordinary care to provide a safe place of work for the servant.[85]

Nevertheless the rule does not apply where the servant is required by his master to enter on a hazardous task under an unfulfilled promise to point out its hazards to him.[86]

c. Maturity, Experience, or Infirmity of Employee

Generally all the ordinary risks of his employment are assumed by a mature or experienced servant; but it has been held that a servant who is of subnormal intelligence, or physically infirm, or both, does not assume ordinary risks to the same extent as do able-bodied employees of normal intelligence.

The risks, dangers, or hazards ordinarily or necessarily incident to his employment or occupation are assumed by an adult servant,[87] a workman of mature years,[88] or an experienced employee.[89] According to some decisions, where to the knowledge of the master the servant is of subnormal intelligence, or physically infirm, or both, he does not assume all the ordinary risks of the employment as do able-bodied employees of normal intelligence, but only such risks as one with his disabilities is able to realize and understand,[90] and the view has been taken that it is the duty of the master to see that the servant is competent for his position.[91] However, there is also authority to the effect that as far as his own safety is concerned, it is for the servant to determine for himself whether physical infirmities known to himself shall bar him from any particular employment,[92] and if by reason of any physical infirmity he is injured while doing work which he has undertaken to do he assumes the risk of the injury and cannot recover therefor.[93] Youth or inexperience of servant as affecting assumption of risk is discussed infra §§ 412–420, and assumption of risk of injury from overexertion infra §§ 390, 401.

§ 373. —— Risks Caused by Changing Condition of Place as Work Progresses

A servant assumes the risk of injury from changing conditions where he is engaged in work which, as it progresses, necessarily and constantly changes the condition of the place of work and the character thereof for safety.

Where a servant is engaged in work that, in its progress, necessarily and constantly changes the condition of the place of work and the character thereof for safety, he assumes the risk of injury therefrom.[94] Stating this proposition in another form, the servant assumes the risk of injury where the very work in which he is engaged creates the danger as the work progresses.[95] This constitutes a well-established exception to the general rule, discussed supra § 201, that it is the duty of the master to furnish a reasonably safe place to work.[96] However, the servant does not assume every risk of

Temporary dangers

danger from changing conditions, but only such as are necessarily incident to the work;[97] and if the master enhances the danger by any negligent act or omission the servant does not assume the risk of injury therefrom.[98] Also the rule does not apply where the master, after his attention had been called by the servant to the probable danger of the work, directed him to continue unless the dangers were so obvious that no ordinarily prudent person would have done the work.[99]

Construction and alteration. Where the work in which the servant is engaged is that of construction, he assumes the risks incident to the constantly changing condition of the uncompleted building or structure on which he is at work, as these are risks which are ordinarily incident to the work which he has undertaken.[1] Nevertheless, if the danger incident to the work is increased by the negligence of the master in any duty devolving on him for the servant's protection, the latter does not assume the increased risk.[2]

Generally, where a servant assists in making alterations in the place of work where he is employed, he assumes the risk incident to so doing;[3] but where the litter left by a carpenter is, with other debris left by other workmen, swept along the place where it is necessary for him to walk, it has been held that the risk of slipping on such debris is not an ordinary incident of his work.[4]

§ 374. —— Risks Incident to Duty of Discovering or Remedying Defects

A servant assumes the risks arising out of defects in the place of work, or in the tools, appliances, or instrumentalities for doing work, which it is his duty, under the contract of employment, to discover or remedy.

Where by the terms of the contract of hiring, it is the duty of the servant to make an inspection for and to discover defects in the place of work, or in the tools, appliances, or instrumentalities for doing the work, or to remedy such defects, or to do both, the risks assumed by him are materially different from those assumed by a servant working in or about such place or with such tools, appliances, and instrumentalities, and he assumes the risks arising out of these defects,[5] although the very nature of the work enlarges or multiplies the risks.[6] This is an exception to the general rule, discussed supra § 201, that the master is bound to furnish the servant with a reasonably safe place to work and with reasonably safe tools, appliances, and instrumentalities for doing the work,[7] and also to the well-settled general rule discussed infra § 381, that the servant ordinarily is not charged with the duty of inspection for the purpose of discovering latent defects or dangers.[8] The rule is not affected by a state statute authorizing a recovery for an injury dangers which ordinarily arise in usual progress of particular work; and when two employees work side by side on task of manual labor this obligation rests on each of them.—Barron Motor Co. v. Bass, 150 So. 202, 167 Miss. 786.

to the servant caused by any defect in the ways, works, machinery, or plant of the master,[9] or which provides that it shall not be an assumption of risk for an employee to remain in the employment after knowledge of the defect or negligence causing the injury unless it is his duty to remedy the defect.[10]

This rule has been applied with respect to a considerable variety of places of work and tools, appliances, and instrumentalities for work, such as cross arms on telephone poles,[11] drift pins,[12] electric light wires,[13] elevators,[14] poles used by electric light, telephone, telegraph, or traction companies,[15] roofs of buildings,[16] and truck wheels.[17]

It does not apply where the facts do not bring the case within it,[18] as where the duty of inspection[19] or of making a dangerous place safe[20] does not rest on the employee in question as part of his employment. It has no application to risks caused by the master's negligence;[21] a servant, although engaged in making a dangerous place safe, assumes only the risk usual and incident after the master has used due care to discover the extent of the dangers of the place.[22]

§ 375. —— Application of Foregoing Principles Generally

Where the master has exercised ordinary care to furnish the servant with a reasonably safe place for work, or with reasonably safe machinery, tools, and appliances, the servant assumes all risks ordinarily incident thereto.

Where the master has exercised ordinary care to furnish the servant with a reasonably safe place for work,[23] or with reasonably safe machinery, tools, and appliances,[24] the servant assumes all risks ordinarily incident thereto.

Oil on driveway of filling station

Oil, dripped from automobiles, on the driveway of a filling station is a usual and natural condition, and the risk arising therefrom is assumed by a filling station employee as an ordinary, natural, and necessary incident to the conduct of the business.—Hunter v. Siphon

If there was any risk in the use of a siphon, it was an ordinary risk incident to the business and was assumed by the employee.—Arkansas-Louisiana Gas Co. v. Tillman, 144 S.W.2d 1077, 201 Ark. 437.

Obvious condition of stepladder, if the stepladder was less rigid or stable than an ordinary stepladder, was a known risk incident to employment, which risk became a part of contract of employment.—Sjostedt v. Webster, 28 N.E.2d 239, 306 Mass. 344.

Employee in charge of machines

Corporation was not liable for employee's death caused by burns from explosion while employee was at work in a room where machines in his charge were making a fuel mixture of air and natural gas and of air and vapor of gasoline, since employee assumed risk of his employment.—Bonner v. Texas Co., C.C.A. Tex., 89 F.2d 291.

The general rule, discussed supra § 372 a, that a servant assumes all the risks ordinarily incident to his employment has been applied to the risks ordinarily incident to the respective employments of a carpenter's helper,[25] farm worker,[26] fireman,[27] ginner,[28] laborer in a clay tile factory,[29] lineman,[30] night watchman,[31] physician[32] or nurse[33] in a state hospital or sanitarium, sawyer,[34] steel worker,[35] and truck driver.[36] So too a servant engaged in picking up trash assumes a risk from dust that is obviously inherent in the work he is employed to do.[37]

Occupational disease. Apart from statute, the risk of contracting a disease incident to an occupation, and not attributable to the master's negligence, is regarded as an ordinary one[38] assumed by the servant;[39] and the master is not liable in such case.[40]

§ 376. —— Mining, Quarrying, and Excavating

An employee engaged in mining or excavating is within the rule that a servant assumes the risks ordinarily incident to his employment, as well as the rule that he assumes the risks arising from the constantly changing condition of his place of work, and, where it is his duty under the contract of employment, to discover or remedy defects, the rule that he assumes the risks attendant on the performance of such duty.

The rule, discussed supra § 372 a, that a servant assumes the risks ordinarily incident to the employment applies to risks ordinarily incident to the work of mining, quarrying, and excavating.[41] So too, in accordance with the rule discussed supra § 373 employees engaged in mining or excavating assume the risks arising from the constantly changing character of their working place as caused by the work itself as it progresses,[42] at least as far as their employment permits them to make an examination thereof or to make alterations looking to their greater security;[43] and for obvious reasons, where it is an incident of the employment for a miner to make his own place of work, any dangers arising from the work as it progresses, due to changing conditions, are assumed by him.[44] Furthermore, the rule, discussed supra § 374, that a servant whose duty it is to make inspection for defects in the place of work or in the tools, instrumentalities, or appliances for work, or to remedy such defects, or to do both, assumes the risk incident to the work, applies in the case of servants of mining companies whose contracts of employment require them to do this class of work.[45]

§ 377. —— Shipping

A servant in a shipping industry is within the rule that a servant assumes all the risks ordinarily incident to his employment.

The rule, discussed supra § 372 a, that servants assume all the risks which are ordinarily incident to the employment in which they are engaged applies to persons engaged as servants in shipping industries.[46]

Assisting in work

§ 378. —— Operation of Railroads

a. In general
b. Operation or switching of trains, cars, or locomotives
c. Working on or near track

a. In General

At common law, and under some statutes, a servant of a railroad company assumes all the risks ordinarily incident to his employment.

In accordance with the rule as to other servants, discussed supra § 372, in the absence of a statute to the contrary,[47] a servant of a railroad company assumes all the risks ordinarily incident to his employment.[48] The rule is the same under some state railroad employers' liability acts.[49] A state constitutional provision relieving certain railroad employees from the doctrine of assumed risk has been held not to apply to employees not engaged in any hazardous railroad work.[50]

Discovery or remedy of defects. The general rule, discussed supra § 374, that a servant, whose duty it is to discover or remedy defects in the place of work or in the tools, appliances or instrumentalities furnished for work, or to do both, assumes the risks ordinarily incidental to that character of work, applies to servants of a railroad company who are hired for the performance of these duties, such as servants performing services of the character under consideration on bridges,[51] tunnels,[52] cars,[53] locomotives,[54] or railroad tracks and roadbeds.[55] So also the rule was applied under the Federal Employers' Liability Act prior to its amendment.[56]

Defective cars or locomotives being hauled for repair. Where the service for which the servant is employed is the handling of defective locomotives and cars which are being hauled to a place where they may be repaired, the servant assumes the extra risk incident to the defective condition thereof, since this is a risk incident to the employment.[57]

Cars of other railroad companies. The risk attending the transportation or use by a railroad company of cars of other railroad companies has been held to be one of the risks which a servant assumes in undertaking the employment.[58] However, it has also been held that a railroad company's duty of inspection requires more careful inspection by it of a car of another railroad company than is required of an employee under the doctrine of assumed risk.[59]

b. Operation or Switching of Trains, Cars, or Locomotives

In the absence of a statute to the contrary, brakemen, switchmen, or other employees engaged in the operation or switching of trains, cars, or locomotives assume the risks ordinarily incident to their respective employments.

In the absence of a statute to the contrary, an employee of a railroad company assumes the risk attending the ordinary and necessary operation of trains.[60] Servants engaged in the operation of trains, cars, or locomotives,[61] such as conductors,[62] brakemen,[63] and firemen,[64] assume the risks ordinarily incident to their respective employments; and likewise a switchman assumes the risks ordinarily incident to his duties.[65] Among the risks so assumed are those arising from the boarding of, and riding on, moving cars or locomotives as the occasion demands,[66] the bumping, jarring, jerking, and jolting of trains as usually operated[67] or when stopped suddenly as the result of an emergency,[68] the switching of cars according to the ordinary and customary methods,[69] the making of flying switches[70] although against the rules where the rules have been abrogated by habitual disregard,[71] inclement weather conditions,[72] low overhead bridges,[73] and the operation known as "bucking" snow, when conducted in the customary manner.[74] However, the risk incurred by a brakeman while aiding in repairing a split switch is not an ordinary risk of his employment precluding recovery under the Federal Employers' Liability Act where repairing a split switch is not a part of his regular duties and

Coupling or uncoupling cars. Servants of a railroad company, whose duties require them to couple or uncouple cars, assume all the ordinary and usual risks incident to such employment.[76]

c. Working on or Near Track

In the absence of a statute providing otherwise, section hands and other employees working on or near tracks or in railroad yards assume the risk of being struck by moving trains, cars, or locomotives, as well as other risks ordinarily incident to their respective employments, including the risks ordinarily incident to the operation, handling, and use of hand cars and like conveyances on which they ride to and from work.

In the absence of a statute providing otherwise, servants working on or near a railroad track or roadbed,[77] or in a railroad yard,[78] such as section hands,[79] track laborers,[80] flagmen,[81] and the like, assume the risks ordinarily incident to their respective employments, although it is generally conceded that the risk is very great.[82] Among these risks is the risk of being struck by moving locomotives, cars, or trains,[83] whether the trains are regular, extra, or "wild,"[84] or although the trains are run on tracks intended for those coming in the opposite direction,[85] or although the trains may belong to a railroad company other than the employer;[86] the risk incident to repairing the place where the servant is at work, thereby causing constant changes as the work progressed;[87] the risk of injury from clearing away the débris of a landslide from the track;[88] the risk from sparks and cinders thrown off by the engines in the ordinary operation of the road while the servant is necessarily standing beside the track as trains pass;[89] and the risk of a team, being used in grading a railroad right of way, becoming frightened by the blowing off of steam from the locomotive except where the engineer senses that the laborers are endangered thereby.[90] However, under the Federal Employers' Liability Act prior to its amendment, a railroad employee whose work took him near or on tracks where there was danger of his being run down by a train did not assume all risk of injury.[91]

While the rule as to assumption of the risk of being injured by a moving locomotive, car, or train has been applied where the movement was made without signals[92] or notice,[93] and there was no rule or custom requiring the giving of a warning,[94] an employee does not, by walking between tracks, assume the risk of being struck where there is a noncompliance with a rule requiring the ringing of the bell when an engine is about to move,[95] and it has been held that a street crossing watchman whose duties require him to be almost constantly on the track does not assume the risk of failure to warn him of the approach of trains by ringing a bell or otherwise.[96]

Use of hand car or like conveyance. The ordinary risks of his employment assumed by a section hand or like employee include the risks ordinarily incident to the operation, handling, or use of a railroad hand car, motor car, or velocipede on which he rides in going to and from work,[97] such as the risk of a collision between a train and the car or velocipede,[98] the risk of derailment of the car by a tool falling off,[99] or the risk connected with the explosion of signal torpedoes placed on the track and run over by the car,[1] or with placing the car on,[2] or removing it from,[3] the track.

3. Knowledge as Affecting Assumption of Risk in General

§ 379. Necessity of Knowledge

A servant does not assume the risks of his employment unless he has actual or constructive knowledge of such risks.

Inasmuch as voluntary action on the part of a servant is essential to the invocation of the doctrine of assumption of risk, as considered supra § 357, it is well settled that in all cases the basis for

On way home for meal

It would be foolish to say that one whose work requires him to be on the track all day should leave the track and take a circuitous route home for his meals, and that, if he does not do so, he assumes all risk of injury received while walking on the track.—Barnes v. Divergent holdings as to assumption of risks arising from master's negligence see supra § 362.

Under State Railroad Employers' Liability Act, employee does not assume other and extraordinary risks and those due to employer's negligence until he is made aware thereof or they become so obvious and immediately dangerous that ordinarily prudent person would observe and appreciate them.—Palmer v. Great Northern Ry. Co., Mont., 170 P.2d 768.

Rescue of person in danger.
In action for death of employee while attempting to rescue children in mine air shaft filled with deadly gas, instruction on issue of assumed risk was properly refused where it did not embody the idea that a rescuer does not assume extraordinary risks when performing emergency acts to save life unless they are rash and reckless.—Central Coal & Coke Co. v. Porter, 280 S.W. 12, 170 Ark. 498.

1, 45 U.S.C.A. § 54, this rule was not changed by the Federal Employers' Liability Act,[8] although, as discussed supra § 359, the amendment has the effect of abolishing the defense of assumption of risk when asserted by a negligent employer as a defense in an action brought under the act.

Risk of negligence of fellow servant. In order to charge the servant with assumption of risks due to the negligence of a fellow servant, it is essential that the servant should have actual knowledge of the risks or that an ordinarily careful or prudent person would have observed and appreciated them.[9]

This rule has been followed in actions under the Federal Employers' Liability Act,[10] although, as considered supra § 359, the doctrine of assumption of risks has been abolished to the extent indicated by the amendment of August 11, 1939, chapter 685 § 1, 45 U.S.C.A. § 54.

§ 380. Right to Rely on Care of Master

In the absence of actual or constructive knowledge to the contrary, the servant has the right to assume that the master has used due care to fulfill the obligations imposed on him by law to protect the servant from injury.

In the absence of actual knowledge to the contrary, or of facts which would charge the servant with knowledge to the contrary,[11] the servant has the right to assume that the master has used due care and diligence to fulfill the obligations imposed on him by law to protect the servant from injury;[12]

"If we turn then to the other alternative, the fellow-servant doctrine contemplated that an employee knew and assumed, when he accepted employment, the risks which negligence of his fellow employees might create. It was in fact a branch of the assumption of risk. When therefore Congress abolished the fellow-servant rule as a defense under the statute, it necessarily abolished the defense of assumption of risk to this extent. In other words, it eliminated the general anticipation of fellow servants' negligence upon which the fellow-servant rule was founded. If anything of assumption of rest remained in relation to the negligence of a fellow employee, it was such as required a showing that the injured one knew of and accepted the risk in the particular incident or situation which brought about his injury."—Owens v. Union Pac. R. Co., 63 S.Ct. 1271, 1275, 319 U.S. 715, 87 L.Ed. 1683, conformed to, C.C.A., 142 F.2d 145, certiorari denied 65 S.Ct. 57, 323 U.S. 740, 89 L.Ed. 593.

and as a corollary it may be stated that the servant is not obliged to exercise ordinary care to see that the master has performed his duty.[13] The true test is not in the exercise of care to discover dangers, but whether the defect is known or plainly observable by the employee.[14]

The rule does not apply where the servant is charged with the duty of keeping the appliance by which he is injured in proper repair,[15] or where he is injured while making an unsafe place safe,[16] or where the servant is creating the place of work or where it is constantly being changed in character by the workman,[17] or where the servant makes an improper use of the appliances furnished.[18]

Selection of fellow servants. A servant is entitled to assume that the master has exercised due care and diligence in the selection and retention of reasonably competent and careful servants.[19] He is under no obligation to investigate the fitness of a fellow servant.[20] Nevertheless, a servant has no right to assume that the master has performed his duty in properly selecting fellow servants where the servant knew, or ought to have known, that such was not the case.[21]

§ 381. Duty to Inspect for Latent Defects or Dangers

The servant ordinarily is not charged with the duty of inspecting the master's place of work or his tools, machinery, appliances, etc., for the purpose of discovering latent defects or dangers.

21. Fla.—Taylor v. Prairie Pebble Phosphate Co., 54 So. 904, 61 Fla. 455.

In accordance with the rule that the servant, in the absence of actual knowledge to the contrary or in the absence of facts which would charge him with knowledge to the contrary, has the right to assume that the master has used due care and diligence to fulfill the obligations imposed on him by law to protect the servant from injury, as considered supra § 380, it is very generally held that the servant is not charged with the duty of inspecting the master's place of work or his tools, machinery, appliances, and instrumentalities for work for the purpose of discovering latent defects or dangers, that is, such defects or dangers as are not discoverable by ordinary observation,[22] except where, as considered supra § 374, the terms of the contract of hiring itself impose on the servant the duty of inspection or of remedying defects, or both.

The exercise of the ordinary care and diligence imposed on an employee in the discharge of his duties does not extend to this length[23] and require the exercise of even ordinary care and diligence in discovering latent defects and dangers.[24] It is not expected that the servant will make close scrutiny into all the details of the instrumentalities with which he deals; the employment forbids him to spend his time in this manner.[25] This rule is not affected by the fact that the servant had an opportunity of ascertaining defects or dangers by investigation.[26]

Applications of rule. The rule that the servant is under no duty to make an inspection for latent defects or dangers has been applied with respect to various places for work, tools, appliances, and instrumentalities,[27] such as boilers,[28] cars,[29] chairs,[30] gates,[31] platforms,[32] rails and railroad ties,[33] roofs of mines,[34] scaffolds,[35] set screws,[36] trapdoors,[37] trestles,[38] tongs,[39] and walls of a pit which were the servant's place of work for repairing engines.[40]

§ 382. Defects or Dangers of Which Servant Has Actual or Constructive Knowledge

The servant generally assumes the risk of injury from defects or dangers of which he has actual knowledge or which are so patent and obvious that he should know of their existence.

Except in so far as modified or abrogated by statute, as considered infra § 383, and in the absence of a contract to the contrary,[41] as a general rule, where the servant has actual knowledge of the dangers to which the service exposes him or where the defects or dangers are so patent and obvious that in the exercise of ordinary care, in the performance of the services for which he was employed, he

A master has the right, it has been said, to presume that the servant will see and guard against obvious dangers.[43] Where the risks are obvious, the failure of an employee to make an inspection amounts to his taking his chances.[44]

Method of acquiring knowledge immaterial. If a servant appreciates the danger before he is injured, it is immaterial how he acquired his knowledge of the danger.[45]

Warning of danger. Where the state of facts on which the rule is predicated exists, no warning of the danger of the employment is necessary in order to charge the servant with an assumption of the risk.[46]

§ 383. —— Effect of Special Statutory Provisions

a. Federal Employers' Liability Act and similar state statutes
b. Other state statutes

a. Federal Employers' Liability Act and Similar State Statutes

In actions under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, prior to its amendment the rule that the servant assumed the risk of injury from such defects and dangers of which he had actual knowledge or which were so patent and obvious that he should have known of their existence was applied.

Prior to the amendment of August 11, 1939 chapter 685 § 1, 45 U.S.C.A. § 54, which, as discussed supra § 359, abolished the doctrine of assumption of risk as to a negligent employer in an action under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, the rule that the servant assumes the risk of injury from such defects or dangers of which he has actual knowledge or which are so patent and obvious that he should know of their existence, as considered supra § 382, was applied in actions under the act.[47] Furthermore, except where the master had violated islation requires employers to take designated precautions for the safety of servants, and prescribes a penalty for failure to do so, and in express terms abolishes the defense of assumption of risk, it is very generally held that this defense is not available, even though the danger caused by noncompliance with the statute was obvious or was actually known and appreciated by the servant; and, according to the general rule, such is also the case, although statutes of this character do not in express terms abolish the defense.

b. Other State Statutes

Where state statutes so provide, a servant having knowledge of defects or dangers does not assume the risk of injury.

In various states constitutional or statutory provisions have modified or abolished the rule that the servant assumes the risk of injury from defects or dangers of which he has knowledge.[50]

In Indiana, by statute, in actions against an employer of five or more persons, the defense of the hazards and dangers "apparent" in the employment contributing to the injury is taken away.[51] In other words, assumption of risk is not available as a defense, although the injured servant had actual or constructive knowledge of the dangers.[52] Under a further provision that such employee shall not be held to have assumed the risk of any defect in the place of work furnished to such employee, or in the tool, implement, or appliance furnished him by such employer, where such defect was, prior to such injury, known to such employer or by the exercise of ordinary care might have been known to him in time to have repaired the same or to have discontinued the use of such defective working place, tool, implement or appliance, when the facts bring the case within this provision, the defense of assumption of risk is not available;[53] and, even if it affirmatively appeared that the employer did not have knowledge of defects causing injury for a sufficient length of time prior to the injury to make repairs, the right to recover at common law would not be defeated if it appeared that the servant also was without knowledge actual or constructive of the defects.[54] However, where it is shown that the master had no knowledge of the defect actual or constructive, the question of assumption of risk has been held to be of no importance, since the evidence shows absence of negligence defeating the action.[55]

In South Carolina a provision of the constitution has eliminated assumption of risk by railroad employees based on knowledge on the part of the injured employee of the defects causing the injury.[56]

In Texas it has been provided by statute that the

50. In Alabama
A statute, providing that the employer is not liable if the employee knew of the defect causing the injury and failed within a reasonable time to give information to his superior "unless he was aware that the master or employer, or such superior, already knew of such defect," does not abolish doctrine of volenti non fit injuria.—Birmingham R. & Electric Co. v. Allen, 13 So. 8, 99 Ala. 359, 20 L.R.A. 457—39 C.J. p 734 note 18.

In Florida
By statute, defense of assumption of risk in enumerated hazardous operations, in actions for injuries sustained by servant by reason of master's negligence, has been abolished. —City of Sebring v. Avant, 117 So. 383, 95 Fla. 960—39 C.J. p 734 note 20.

In Massachusetts
A statute in substance the same as that of Alabama has been held not to abolish the common-law rule charging the servant with the assumption of known or obvious risks.—Cassady v. Boston & A. R. Co., 41 N.E. 129, 164 Mass. 168—39 C.J. p 734 note 30.

In Mississippi
Code 1942 § 1456, and similar statutes, providing that, in actions for personal injury to an employee or for his death, the employee shall not be held to have assumed the risks of his employment in any case where such injury or death results in whole or part from negligence of the master, except as to conductors or locomotive engineers in charge of dangerous or unsafe cars or engines voluntarily operated by them, applies irrespective of the knowledge of the servant.—Eastman, Gardiner & Co. v. plea of assumed risk is not available on the ground of knowledge or means of knowledge by the servant of a railroad company of the defect or danger where the employer or his foreman also knows of the defect[57] or where the employer has been guilty of negligence.[58]

§ 384. —— Effect of Negligence of Master

A servant generally assumes the risks attributable to his employer's negligence where he has knowledge of such risks or they are so patent and obvious that he should have known of their existence.

Unless otherwise provided by statute, as considered supra §§ 359, 383, and except in jurisdictions where the servant does not in any circumstances assume the risk of the master's negligence,[59] the general rule that the servant assumes the risk of injury from defects or dangers of which he has actual knowledge or which are so patent and obvious that he should know of their existence, as considered supra § 382, applies, although the risk is the result of the negligence of the master,[60] and although by reason thereof the risk is greater than

(1) There is no assumption of risk of injury caused by master's negligence, as considered supra § 362, although servant actually knows of and appreciates dangers arising therefrom.—Whittington v. (2) In some decisions the court has held that such risks were assumed by servant if he knew of risks or in exercise of ordinary care should have known of them.—Davis v. City of Independence, 49 S.W.2d 95, 330 Mo. 201—Shey v. Central Coal & Coke Co., 21 S.W.2d 772, 323 Mo. 1058—Harff v. Green, 67 S.W. 576, 168 Mo. 308—39 C.J. p 735 note 41 [a] (5).

In North Carolina

(1) In various decisions it has been held that the servant does not assume risks caused or added to by the master's negligence, unless such risks were so obvious and threatening that a man of ordinary prudence would not continue to work.—Batton v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co., 193 S.E. 674, 212 N.C. 256, certiorari denied Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Batton, 58 S.Ct. 750, 303 U.S. 651, 82 L.Ed. 1112—McCord v. (2) However, as shown supra § 362, there have been numerous decisions announcing the rule that the servant does not assume the risk of injury growing out of the master's negligence and that such rule admits of no exceptions whatsoever.

that ordinarily incident to the employment.[61] The servant, by working under these conditions, dispenses with the duty of the master to take reasonable precautions for his safety.[62] Where the servant has assumed the risk, the fact that he was himself free from contributory negligence does not make the master liable for an injury resulting from the risk assumed.[63]

§ 385. —— Effect of Temporary Forgetfulness of Dangers or Defects

The servant ordinarily assumes the risk of injury from known defects and dangers, although the injuries were sustained at a time when he had momentarily forgotten their existence.

The rule as to assumption of risk of injury from known defects and dangers, as considered supra § 382, ordinarily applies with full force and effect, although the injuries of which the servant complains were sustained at a time when he had momentarily forgotten their existence.[64] It has been held, however, that the rule does not apply where the temporary forgetfulness was caused by the engrossing nature of the work,[65] although this, of course, would not be true where the engrossing nature of the work fixed the servant's attention on the danger instead of diverting it therefrom.[66]

§ 386. —— Effect of Attempt to Save Master's Property

The servant ordinarily assumes the risk of injury from obvious and open defects and dangers, although they are encountered in an attempt to save the master's property.

Where the danger is obvious and open, the fact that the servant encountered it in an attempt to save the master's property will not deprive the master of the right to set up the defense of assumption of risk.[67] If the employee exposes himself to dangers rashly, solely to rescue the master's property, he cannot recover if he is injured in the attempt.[68] It is the same whether the danger to be encountered is regarded as a detail of the work or in the nature of a new employment.[69] On the other hand, it has also been held that a servant is under a general duty to conserve the property of the master;[70] and that a servant is not necessarily at fault in exposing himself to a risk which a volunteer would not be justified in assuming but the standard must be a proper balance between the risk to life or limb and that to the property, considering the question of imminence and gravity of possible injury and of value of property which might be damaged.[71]

§ 387. —— Effect of Risks Arising after Commencement of Service

The servant assumes the risk of injury from known defects or dangers which arise after the commencement of the service.

The doctrine of the assumption of known or obvious risks by the servant, as considered supra § 382, applies as well to those which arise during the service as to those in contemplation at the time of the original hiring.[72]

§ 388. —— Character of Knowledge Sufficient

The servant may be charged with assumption of risks where the defects and dangers were so open and obvious that he should have known of the risks.

Risks caused by changing condition of place as work progresses see supra § 373.

In order to charge the servant with assumption of risks by reason of knowledge thereof, actual knowledge is not indispensable, but it is sufficient that the defects and dangers were so open and obvious that he should have known of the risks.[73] The law charges the servant with notice of the risks,[74] whether or not he was actually aware of them,[75] on the theory that one knows what it is one's duty to know,[76] and he will not be permitted to say that he did not appreciate the danger.[77]

Opportunity to acquire knowledge. The servant assumes, in addition to the risks actually known to him, such risks of injury from defects and dangers as in the exercise of ordinary care in the performance of his duties his opportunities to discover would have disclosed to him;[78] and, on the other hand, he is not charged with the assumption of risks which are not incidental to his employment, and of which he has had no opportunity to learn.[79] Before a master can be relieved of liability by the servant's assumption of risk incident to the service, the servant must have equal opportunity with the master to know the surroundings and be equally competent to judge of the risks and hazards.[80]

Knowledge of fellow servant. While a servant may assume an obvious risk of danger to himself, he cannot assume it for a fellow servant who does not know of the defect or danger.[81]

§ 389. —— Extent of Knowledge Necessary

A servant is not charged with assumption of risk unless he knows of and appreciates the dangers incident to the work.

In order to charge a servant with assumption of risk it is not sufficient that he should have knowledge of defects in the place of work, or in the machinery, tools, appliances, or instrumentalities for work, or in the methods of work, etc., but it is further necessary that he should know of and appreciate the dangers incident to the work under the existing conditions.[82] Assumption of risk implies both knowledge or the means of knowledge, and an appreciation of danger.[83] As has been aptly stated, "a defect and the danger arising from it are not necessarily to be identified, and a person may know of one without appreciating the other."[84] Likewise, it is not sufficient that the servant should merely know that there is "some danger" attending the service, but it is further essential that there should be actual understanding and appreciation of its nature and extent,[85] unless it is so obvious that the servant should know of and appreciate it.[86]

Where the servant is injured by a known risk of the employment assumed by him, it is immaterial that he did not know the precise extent or character of the injury liable to be sustained,[87] or that he did not appreciate every particular of the risk or all the possible consequences thereof,[88] if as a reasonably prudent man he should have anticipated that some injury might result from the defect.[89] Where he has a general knowledge of defects sufficient to charge him with knowledge of danger, he assumes the risk, although he may not know of the particular defects which cause the injury;[90] but the servant by reason of knowledge of one defect or danger does not take the risk of another of which he has no knowledge;[91] and if both contribute to injure him, he is entitled to recover if the accident would not have happened but for the unknown defect.[92]

In order to constitute an assumption of risk, knowledge of the risk must come in time to be of use; if knowledge is not acquired until too late to avert the injury, there is no assumption of risk by reason thereof.[93]

§ 390. —— Application of Foregoing Principles

a. Method of conducting business in general
b. Methods of work
c. Place of work
d. Machinery, tools, and appliances
e. Negligence or incompetency of fellow servant
f. Injuries sustained by servant's overexertion
g. Selection of more hazardous method of work
h. Selection of more hazardous ways of passage
i. Unnecessary occupation of dangerous position
j. Failure to give notice of dangerous position

a. Method of Conducting Business in General

A servant who knows or should know of the hazards of the employment as the business is conducted assumes the risks.

In accordance with the general rule and subject to its limitations and qualifications, considered supra §§ 382–389, it has generally been held that a master may conduct his business in his own way, and that the servant who either knows or, in the exercise of ordinary care, should know of the hazards of the employment as the business is conducted, assumes the risk incident thereto[94] even though a different method of conducting the business would have been less dangerous.[95] Among the obvious risks thus assumed are those attendant on the use of the ways, works, and machinery of a permanent character that are intended to be retained as part of the plant to which the contract for service relates.[96]

Subsequent alteration or improvements. Where a servant on accepting service understands the master's methods of conducting business and the risk attached thereto, he cannot call on the master to make alterations in order to provide greater safety for the servant;[97] and it has been held that this is true even though in some parts his ways and works would not be deemed reasonably safe and proper if he were starting to do the same kind of work under an arrangement with employees to serve in a business afterward to be established.[98]

Effect of constitutional and statutory provisions. The rule that the servant assumes the known hazards in the method by which the employer's business is conducted is not affected by constitutional or statutory provisions which abolish the doctrine of assumption of risk as far as it applies to knowledge by a servant of a railroad "of the defective or unsafe character or condition of any machinery, ways, appliances or structures,"[99] or by a statute giving a remedy to an injured servant for defects "which arose from, or had not been discovered or remedied owing to, the negligence of the employer, or of any person in the service of the employer, and intrusted by him with the duty of seeing that the ways, works, or machinery were in proper condition,"[1] or by a statute abolishing the defense of assumption of risk where the servant has sustained injury from a defect which was reported but not remedied.[2]

b. Methods of Work

(1) In general
(2) Failure to furnish sufficient force for work
(3) Failure to promulgate or enforce rules for conduct of work

(1) In General

The servant assumes the risk of injury from known defects or dangers in the methods of work as it is performed in the operation of the master's business.

In accordance with the general rule and subject to its limitations and qualifications, considered supra §§ 382–389, where defects or dangers in the methods of work as it is performed in the operation of the master's business exist, and the risk of injury therefrom is or, in the exercise of ordinary care by the servant, should be known and appreciated by him, he assumes the risk[3] even though there was a safer method of work which, had it been adopted, would have avoided the accident;[4] and especially is this rule applicable where the servant injured lent his aid to establish the method of work by which he was injured.[5] It has been held that it is the duty of the servant to quit where he knows that the work is being carried on in such a manner that an accident may occur.[6]

Where the methods of work are known to the servant on accepting service, he may make no claim on the employer to change them, but accepts them as they are and cannot recover for injuries sustained therefrom.[7]

Right of servant to rely on care of master. Under the rule discussed supra § 380, the servant is, in general, entitled to assume that the master has established and promulgated a reasonably safe system or method of work and that he will enforce it.[8]

Failure to furnish appliances for work. Where the master fails to furnish appliances essential to a reasonably safe performance of the work for which the servant is employed and the servant knows and appreciates or, in the exercise of ordinary care, should know and appreciate the danger of performing the work without such appliances, he assumes the risk of so doing.[9]

(2) Failure to Furnish Sufficient Force for Work

Where a servant knows or should know that the master has furnished an insufficient force for the reasonably safe prosecution of the work, he assumes the risks incident to working with insufficient assistance.

In the absence of any emergency,[10] where a servant knows or ought to know that the master has furnished too few servants for the reasonably safe prosecution of the work, he assumes the risks incident to working with insufficient assistance,[11] especially where the manner of doing the work is left to the servant, who is an expert.[12] Where a servant discovers that the force for work is insufficient, it has been held that it is his duty to quit the service.[13]

In Kentucky
(1) Where a servant knowingly continues to work with inadequate assistance or tools, there is an assumption of risk by servant, if he knows, or if it is plainly obvious to a person of ordinary prudence, that performing such work under similar circumstances will subject servant to severe strain and likely result in injury complained of.—Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Yett, 168 S.W.2d 556, 293 Ky. 71—39 C.J. p 744 note 12.
(2) However, it has been stated that, where master fails to furnish sufficient number of men with which to do work, servant injured in doing such work does not assume risk of injury.—Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Alexander, 127 S.W.2d 395, 277 Ky. 719.

12. Mo.—Blundell v. William A. Miller El. Mfg. Co., 88 S.W. 103, 189 Mo. 552.

The assumption of risk of injury due to the failure of the master to furnish a sufficient force for work will not prevent a recovery where it was not the proximate cause of the injury;[14] nor will the rule apply where the servant acted under orders of a superior in an emergency for the purpose of preventing probable loss of life and property and where he acted as occasion demanded without deliberation and without time to consider the danger to himself.[15]

Prior to the amendment of August 11, 1939, chapter 685 § 1, to the Federal Employers' Liability Act, 45 U.S.C.A. § 54, it was held that the operation of the rule was not affected by the act.[16] The word "defect," as used under a statute materially limiting the doctrine of assumption of risk by employees of a railroad company, has been held to include a defective force of men, that is, a force less than is required for the work.[17]

Right to rely on care of master. In accordance with the rule and the limitations placed thereon, considered supra § 380, a servant is entitled to assume that the master has furnished a sufficient number of employees to do the work.[18]

(3) Failure to Promulgate or Enforce Rules for Conduct of Work

A servant assumes the risk of injury arising from the employer's failure to promulgate or enforce rules for the conduct of the work where he knows or should know of the employer's failure and appreciates or should appreciate the dangers resulting therefrom.

Where a servant knows or, in the exercise of reasonable care, should know that the master has failed to promulgate or to enforce proper rules for the conduct of the work, and also knows and appreciates or should know and appreciate the dangers arising therefrom, he has been held to have assumed the risk,[19] especially where, in addition, it does not appear that the rule, had it existed and been enforced, would have prevented the injury.[20]

The rule has been applied to risks of moving or operating machinery[21] or trains[22] without warnings or signals; but it has been held that, where warnings of the movements of cars were usually given and the servant had never seen cars moved without such warnings and did not know of the absence of a rule requiring warning, he did not assume the risk of injury of being struck by a car set in motion without warning.[23]

c. Place of Work

(1) In General

A servant ordinarily assumes the risk of injury from known defects or dangers existing at his place of employment.

Except as the rule may be otherwise as a result of statutory regulations,[24] in accordance with the general rule and subject to its limitations and qualifications, considered supra §§ 382–389, where a servant knows or, in the exercise of ordinary care, should know of the defects or inherent dangers in the premises or place of work where he is employed and appreciates or should, in the exercise of ordinary care, appreciate the risk of injury therefrom, he usually assumes the risk.[25] However, it has very generally been held in accordance with well

Scientific knowledge

An ordinary factory employee is not chargeable with scientific knowledge regarding danger of contracting silicosis by working in silica-laden air.—Rebel v. Standard Sanitary the servant may not call on his employer to make alterations for the purpose of securing greater safety.[27]

Right to rely on care of master as to place for work. In accordance with the rule stated supra § 380, and subject to its limitations, the servant has the right to assume that the master has used due care and diligence to furnish him with a reasonably safe place for work,[28] except where he has actual knowledge to the contrary, or unless the circumstances are such as to charge him with knowledge,[29] or, as has been said, where the dangers are as apparent to him as to the master.[30] Where a servant has been put to work in a safe place, he is entitled to assume that the place will not thereafter be rendered unsafe by acts of the master or those representing him.[31]

The rule that the servant has the right to assume that the master has used due care to furnish him with a reasonably safe place to work has been applied in connection with various places of work.[32] A servant of a railroad company may assume that the track, roadbed, and bridges are kept in a reasonably safe condition,[33] and a miner may assume that the master has exercised due care to keep the mine in which he works in a reasonably safe condition,[34] as by proper inspection[35] or by proper timbering.[36]

Where one company uses another's newly constructed road, a brakeman of the former cannot rightfully assume that the frogs and guard rails of the new road are filled or blocked as required by statute and dismiss all thought of them from his mind.[37]

Unlighted or defectively lighted premises. A servant ordinarily assumes the obvious or known risks of injury due to a failure to light the place of work or to light it adequately.[38]

Stairways

(1) In general.—Burke v. Crimmins, 152 N.E. 43, 256 Mass. 14.

(2) Practical nurse employed to care for defendant's husband assumed risk as matter of law and could not recover for injuries sustained in fall down unlighted stairs

(2) Uncovered or Unguarded Places; Defective or Dangerous Floors

A servant ordinarily assumes the risk of injury from uncovered or unguarded places or defective or dangerous floors at his place of employment where he knows thereof and appreciates the danger.

The general rule that the servant assumes the risk of injury from known defects or dangers existing at his place of work, considered supra subdivision c (1) of this section, has been held to apply in case of injuries sustained by the servant by reason of uncovered or unguarded places[39] such as air shafts,[40] cisterns,[41] culverts,[42] elevator shafts,[43] hatches,[44] uncovered holes in floors[45] or in railroad yards,[46] mine shafts,[47] pathways, walks, or runways,[48] pits,[49] platforms,[50] sewers,[51] stairways,[52] tanks,[53] trapdoors,[54] vats,[55] and walks on side of sidetrack.[56]

Defective or dangerous floors. The general rule stated supra subdivision c (1) of this section has been applied in the case of floors from which injuries were sustained by reason of their defective construction,[57] by reason of the floor being uncompleted,[58] by reason of the floor sloping,[59] by reason of the floor becoming unevenly worn,[60] by reason of the floor becoming worn and splintered by heavily loaded trucks driven over it,[61] by reason of the floor being wet or greasy and slippery,[62] or by reason of obstacles or obstructions being left on the floor.[63]

(3) Railroad Tracks, Roadbeds, and Yards

In the absence of statutory regulations to the contrary a servant ordinarily assumes the risk of injury from known defects or dangers in the railroad track or roadbed.

In accordance with the general rule stated supra subdivision c (1) of this section, a servant who knows or, in the exercise of ordinary care, should know of defects and dangers in the railroad track or roadbed and who understands and appreciates the risk of injury therefrom has been held to assume the risk,[64] although, as considered supra §

359, the rule may be otherwise in cases under the amendment of August 11, 1939, chapter 685, § 1, to the Federal Employers' Liability Act, 45 U.S.C.A. § 54.

The rule that the servant assumes the risk of injury from known defects or dangers in the railroad tracks or roadbed has been applied in case of injuries sustained by reason of defective bridges,[65] decayed or defective ties or sleepers,[66] failure to maintain a block signal system,[67] hole in roadbed,[68] insufficiently ballasted tracks,[69] and various other defects or dangers.[70]

Obstructions on, over, or near track or roadbed. Where the risk of injury from obstructions on, over, or near a railroad track or roadbed is known to the servant or should be known and appreciated by him in the exercise of ordinary care, it has been held, in the absence of a statute to the contrary, that he assumes the risk of injury therefrom[71] even in case of a structure which is unusually near the track where the structure is of a permanent character.[72]

The rule that the servant assumes the risk of injury from known obstructions on, over, or near a railroad track or roadbed has been applied in the case of awnings[73] or a roof[74] projecting from the station platform, bridge pillars,[75] bridge trusses,[76] cars or locomotives standing on an adjacent track,[77] cattle chutes,[78] cattle guards,[79] overhead bridges,[80] and various other obstructions.[81]

Nevertheless, in accordance with well-settled principles considered supra § 389, it is not sufficient that the servant had knowledge of the obstructions, but it is also necessary that he should have known and appreciated the risk of injury therefrom.[82]

(4) Mines and Quarries

Servants working in mines and quarries who know and appreciate the defects and dangers therein assume the risk of injury from such defects and dangers.

In accordance with the general rule, stated supra subdivision c (1) of this section, in the absence of a statute to the contrary servants working in mines[83] or quarries[84] who know and appreciate the defects and dangers of the place where they are working or, in the exercise of ordinary care, should know and appreciate such defects and dangers are held to assume the risk therefrom, and especially is this true where the work of the servant himself makes the place of work unsafe.[85]

The rule has been applied in case of injuries sustained by reason of absence of a derailing switch at the mouth of a mine,[86] absence of fire protection,[87] a defective manway and heading,[88] a defective ventilating fan,[89] defective ways for hauling coal[90] or crushed rock,[91] an entry too small to permit of alighting from car,[92] floors defective from failure to provide means for water to escape,[93] slanting pillars,[94] tracks from which coal is dumped,[95] unsafe mine roofs,[96] as, for instance, unpropped or defectively propped roofs[97] and unpropped ledges.[98]

(5) Excavations

Where the danger of caving caused by excavation and the likelihood of injury therefrom are known to the servant, he assumes the risk of such injury.

Under the general rule considered supra subdivision c (1) of this section, where the danger of caving caused by excavation and the likelihood of injury therefrom are known to the servant or are so open and obvious that in the exercise of ordinary care he should know thereof, he assumes the risk of such injury.[99] Where he has actual knowledge of the risk, the fact that he was not notified thereof by the master is of no consequence.[1] He is bound to take notice of the ordinary familiar laws of nature and to govern himself accordingly without any special instruction or knowledge.[2]

(2) Uncovered or unguarded machinery or appliances
(3) Simple tools or appliances
(4) Cars, locomotives, cranes, derricks, ladders, platforms, etc.
(5) Electric appliances and equipment

(1) In General

A servant ordinarily assumes the risk of injury from defective or dangerous machinery, tools, or appliances furnished by the master where the servant knows of and appreciates the danger.

Under the rules considered supra §§ 382–389, and in the absence of statutory regulations to the contrary, where machinery, tools, or appliances furnished by the master are defective, imperfect, or inherently dangerous, the servant ordinarily assumes the risk of injury therefrom if he knows and appreciates the danger or if the danger is so open and obvious that, in the exercise of ordinary care, the servant should know of and appreciate it;[3] and the fact that the servant is not negligent in the use of machinery, tools, or appliances furnished does not affect the operation of the rule.[4] Where the servant knows and appreciates the dangers, it has been held to be his duty to quit the service.[5] Where the machinery and appliances are known and understood by the employee on accepting service, he can make no claim on the employer to change them; he accepts them as they are, and if injured cannot recover damages.[6]

es,[27] revolving shafts,[28] ropes,[29] saws,[30] scrapers,[31] skids,[32] sprags,[33] stepping boards,[34] switches,[35] tables,[36] trestles,[37] turntables,[38] wagons or trucks,[39] walks,[40] wheels,[41] and wrenches.[42] The rule has also been applied to animals furnished by the employer.[43]

In accordance with well established principles considered supra § 389, mere knowledge of defects in machinery, tools, appliances, and instrumentalities for work is not sufficient to charge the servant with assumption of risk, but it is further necessary that he should know of and appreciate the dangers incident to the work under the existing conditions.[44] Likewise, knowledge of a defect in appliances furnished will not bar a recovery where it was not acquired until too late to avert injury.[45]

Right to rely on care of master. In accordance with the rule stated supra § 380, and subject to its limitations, a servant has the right to assume that the master has exercised due care in furnishing reasonably safe tools, appliances, and instrumentalities for work,[46] and in subsequently inspecting and repairing them to keep them in their condition,[47] unless he has actual knowledge to the contrary or unless the circumstances are such as to charge him with knowledge.[48] It has been so held in respect of the master's duty to furnish reasonably safe cars,[49] chisels,[50] ladders,[51] locomotives,[52] saws,[53] scaffolds,[54] and sledge hammers.[55]

(2) Uncovered or Unguarded Machinery or Appliances

A servant ordinarily assumes the risk of injury from unguarded or uncovered machinery or appliances where he knows of and appreciates the danger.

The general rule that the servant assumes the risk of injury resulting from defective or dangerous machinery, tools, or appliances furnished by the master where the servant knows of and appreciates the danger, considered supra subdivision d (1) of this section, has been applied in the case of unguarded or uncovered machinery or appliances,[56] such as belts and gearing,[57] cables,[58] cogwheels,[59] derrick gearing,[60] dough mixers,[61] elevator platforms,[62] elevators,[63] flywheels,[64] knives,[65] mangles,[66] pinions,[67] planers,[68] rollers,[69] saws,[70] set screws,[71] shafting,[72] shafts,[73] and trolley wires.[74]

Nevertheless, in accordance with principles considered supra § 389, where the servant, although having knowledge that the machinery or appliance was unguarded, did not appreciate the danger, he did not assume the risk.[75] Furthermore, a servant, although he may have known that machinery was unguarded, did not assume the risk of other defects or dangers of which he had no knowledge.[76]

(3) Simple Tools or Appliances

A servant generally assumes the risk of injury from defects and dangers in simple tools and appliances.

Except in a limited number of jurisdictions,[77] it is very generally held that a servant assumes the risk of injury from defects and dangers in what are commonly designated as simple tools and appliances,[78] especially if he has had experience in the use

Basis of doctrine

Simple tool doctrine is based on doctrine of assumed risk.—Ward v. Marshall, 168 S.W.2d 348, 293 Ky. 18—Nugent Sand Co. v. Howard, 11 S.W.2d 985, 227 Ky. 91.

Reasons for rule

(1) The defects and dangers inherent in the use of the defective tools and appliances are obvious.

Tenn.—Shepherd v. City of Chattanooga, 76 S.W.2d 322, 168 Tenn. 153.
39 C.J. p 762 note 41.

(2) The servant has an equal or better opportunity than the master to learn of such defects and to comprehend the risks of injury therefrom.
Ga.—Southern R. Co. v. Cowan, 183 S.E. 331, 52 Ga.App. 360.

In Arkansas

(1) Simple-tool doctrine does not apply absolutely but simplicity of tool and skill required in its use must be considered in determining degree of care to be used by master in selection of such tools for his servant; an employer's liability for defects in common tools is governed

of such tools.[79]

The "simple-tool doctrine" has no application where the tool inflicting the injury was being used by another than the injured servant,[80] especially where it was not being used in the ordinary way,[81] or where the master had actual knowledge of the defect and the employee had not,[82] or where a tool was furnished by the master for a purpose for which it was unfit, and the use of which in the business for which it was furnished is dangerous to the employee without his knowledge of the danger.[83] Further, it has been held that the simple-tool doctrine is inapplicable where the defect in the tool was not observable or discoverable by inspection such as a workman using it could reasonably be expected to make.[84]

Effect of statutory provisions. The rule that the servant assumes the risk of injury from defects and dangers in simple tools and appliances is not changed by an employers' liability act providing that, if the servant shall receive any injury by reason of any defect or unsafe condition in any tools "except simple tools" used in the business of the employer, the employer shall be deemed to have knowledge of such defect;[85] nor is it changed by a statute abolishing the doctrine of assumption of risk in case of the master's negligence.[86]

Particular tools. Various tools have been designated as simple tools within the rule,[87] such as axes,[88] blocks and tackles,[89] chisels,[90] clamps,[91] claw bars,[92] emery wheels,[93] hammers,[94] hatchets,[95] hooks,[96] iron rods,[97] paint brushes,[98] picks,[99] rail cutters,[1] shovels,[2] spike mauls,[3] spikes,[4] sticks with which windows are held open,[5] "T" rails,[6] tie picks,[7] tongs,[8] wagon seat springs,[9] and wrenches.[10]

On the other hand, various tools have been held not to be simple tools,[11] such as a scaffold not erected by the servant but under the direction of a gang by particular facts.—Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Spangler, C.C.A.Ark., 140 F. 2d 917.

(2) The simplicity of a tool ordinarily is but a circumstance to be considered by the jury in determining the duty resting on the master in furnishing it and of the servant in using it.—Norton & Wheeler Stave Co. v. Wright, 106 S.W.2d 178, 194 Ark. 115.

Mauran, 12 A.2d 285, 64 R.I. 340.

boss[12] and a stool used in a shoe store to reach boxes of shoes on shelves, and containing a horizontal and slanting side with legs attached by concealed screws.[13]

Ladders have been frequently designated as simple tools,[14] although a ladder may be of such nature and used for such a purpose that it does not constitute a simple tool.[15]

(4) Cars, Locomotives, Cranes, Derricks, Ladders, Platforms, Etc.

In the absence of statutory regulations to the contrary, a servant assumes the risk of injury from defects in or on cars, locomotives, cranes, derricks, elevators, ladders, platforms, etc., where he knows of the defects and appreciates the dangers.

Under the rule considered supra subdivision d (1) of this section, at least in cases in which the amendment of August 11, 1939, chapter 685 § 1, to the Federal Employers' Liability Act, 45 U.S.C.A. § 54, is not applicable, where cars and hand or motor cars[16] or locomotives[17] are defective, imperfect, or inherently dangerous, the servant assumes the risk of injury therefrom if he knows and appreciates the danger, or if the danger is so open and obvious that, in the exercise of ordinary care, he should know of and appreciate it.

The fact that a servant knew of the defective condition of a hand car does not preclude his recovery for injuries sustained through a derailment of the car caused by excessive speed.[18]

Cars and hand cars. The rule has been applied in case of cars or hand cars equipped with defective brakes,[19] brake staffs,[20] couplings,[21] coupling levers,[22] coupling pin chains,[23] doors,[24] draw bars,[25] drawheads,[26] hand holds,[27] platforms,[28] running boards,[29] springs,[30] or steps,[31] or without necessary equipment such as bumpers[32] or check chains.[33] In addition, the servant assumes the risk of coupling cars with a coupling apparatus different from those apparatuses in ordinary use, the risk being open to the ordinary observation of any person using reasonable care and prudence,[34] or of coupling cars of unequal heights, which fact is known to him.[35]

Nevertheless, in accordance with principles discussed supra § 389, the fact that an employee knew of the defective condition of a car, and consented to ride on it, will not of itself preclude a recovery for injuries received in consequence of such defect unless it was so glaring as to threaten immediate injury, or such that a person of ordinary prudence would not have used it to ride upon.[36] Furthermore, a servant does not, by the use of a hand car known to be defective, assume the risk of injury from other unknown negligence of the employer, coöperating with the known defect to cause the injury.[37]

Locomotives. The rule has been applied where a locomotive had defective brakes,[38] brake staffs,[39] brake wheels,[40] drawheads,[41] flues,[42] footboards,[43] headlights,[44] pilots,[45]steps,[46] valves,[47] or wheels,[48] or where it was without necessary equipment, such as a grip cock to let water out of pipes,[49] or driver brakes,[50] platforms, and grab irons,[51] screens for water gauges[52] or for lubricator feed glasses,[53] or where it was without a signal bell[54] or sockets.[55]

Cranes, derricks, elevators, hoists, winches, and windlasses. The rule has been applied in the case of cranes,[56] derricks,[57] elevators,[58] hoists,[59] winches,[60] and windlasses.[61]

Under a limitation of the rule stated supra § 389, mere knowledge of the defect in the instrumentality, without an appreciation of the danger incident to its use, will not charge the servant with an assumption of the risk.[62]

(5) Electric Appliances and Equipment

A servant ordinarily assumes the risk of injury from defective or dangerous electric appliances and equipment where he knows of and appreciates the dangers.

The rule considered supra subdivision d (1) of this section, that the servant ordinarily assumes the risk of injury from defective or dangerous machinery, tools, and appliances where he knows of and appreciates the danger, has been applied in the case of electrical appliances and equipment,[68] such as lamps,[69] uninsulated wires,[70] and poles.[71]

e. Negligence or Incompetency of Fellow Servant

In the absence of contrary statutory regulations, the servant assumes the risks of injury from the incompetency or negligence of fellow servants when they are obvious or fully known and appreciated by the servant.

Under the rules considered supra §§ 382–389, and subject to their limitations, the servant assumes the risks of injury from the incompetency or negligence of fellow servants when they are obvious or fully known and appreciated by the servant.[72] In decisions prior to the amendment of August 11, 1939, chapter 685, § 1, 45 U.S.C.A. § 54, this rule was followed in actions brought under the Federal Employers' Liability Act.[73]

The rule is not applicable when the fellow servants have failed to observe a rule or practice established by the employer for the protection of the employees;[74] and there is no assumption of risk of injury from the negligence of a fellow servant by reason of knowledge thereof where knowledge was acquired too late to avert injury.[75]

Reliance on care of fellow servant. The servant has the right to assume that fellow servants are using due care and diligence in the performance of their duties.[76] He has a right to act on this as-

Lineman

(1) Experienced lineman assumes risk of breaking of any pole he is called on to climb in course of his employment, if defect which caused the pole to break was not of original construction, but this rule has reference to cases where the line is already constructed and in operation and where the lineman proceeds on his own responsibility to the performance of his duty; it has no application where the pole had only recently been set up by other employees of employer whose duty it was to inspect it, and there is no showing that the defect which caused the pole to break was latent and undiscoverable by any reasonable precaution.—City of Sebring v. Avant, 117 So. 383, 95 Fla. 960.

(2) Lineman, learning after climbing sound pole that another lineman was about to climb, and later was climbing, nearby defective pole, breaking of which resulted in both poles falling, was chargeable with such knowledge as he reasonably should have had of risk attendant on added strain.—Glidden v. Public Service Co. of New Hampshire, 183 A. 865, 88 N.H. 4.

sumption unless he knows of their negligence.[77]

f. Injuries Sustained by Servant's Overexertion

A servant ordinarily assumes the risk of physical injury to himself as a result of overexertion in doing the work for which he is employed.

A servant ordinarily assumes the risk of physical injury to himself sustained by reason of his overtaxing his strength or powers of endurance in doing the work for which he is employed[78] when the occasion presents no emergency requiring hasty action.[79] The servant assumes the risk of injury whether or not he knew that the particular injury sustained might result.[80]

In actions brought prior to the amendment of August 11, 1939, chapter 685 § 1, to the Federal Employers' Liability Act, 45 U.S.C.A. § 54, it was held that the act did not affect the operation of this rule.[81] The word "defect" as used under a state statute materially limiting the doctrine of assumption of risk by employees of a railroad company has been held to include a "defective" force of men, that is, a force of men less than required for the work, and a recovery will be allowed to a railroad shop worker for injuries resulting from a strain in lifting a heavy weight by reason of the company's failure to furnish a sufficient force to do the work.[82]

g. Selection of More Hazardous Method of Work

Where there are two ways in which work may be done, one safe or reasonably safe and the other hazardous, and the servant knowingly adopts the hazardous method, he assumes the risk.

Except perhaps in a few jurisdictions,[83] the general rule is that, where there are two ways in which work may be done, one safe or reasonably safe and the other hazardous, and the servant knowingly adopts the hazardous method of doing the work, he is held to have assumed the risk of so doing and cannot recover for any injuries sustained thereby,[84] and the general rule has been held applicable although other employees of the master also adopt the dangerous method of doing the work.[85]

In order to constitute assumption of risk by the servant through choice of a more dangerous method, it is not enough that he knew of a safer way, but the safer way must have been reasonably available to him.[86] Further, where there are two ways in which a servant may do a particular thing, one of which is dangerous and the other not so dangerous, both, however, furnished by the master with the intention that the servant may at his discretion use either, the servant does not assume the risk of injury by choosing the more hazardous method of work.[87]

h. Selection of More Hazardous Ways of Passage

A servant assumes the risk of injury where he voluntarily chooses a dangerous, in lieu of an available safe, way of passage to or from or on the master's premises.

Where a servant has his choice of ways of going to and from or on the premises of the master, one of which is safe or reasonably so and the other dangerous, and he voluntarily selects the dangerous way, he assumes the risk of injury from so doing;[88] and this is true no matter how often the same risk has been taken by himself and others, including a superior servant in charge of the work.[89] Where there is more than one way that the employee might have gone to the place of work, each in some degree hazardous, but no passageway is specially provided by the master, and the servant goes the way usually taken by the servants, the master is charged with notice of the fact and the servant will not be charged under such circumstances with assumption of risk.[90]

i. Unnecessary Occupation of Dangerous Position

A servant assumes the risk of injury where he voluntarily and unnecessarily places himself in an obviously dangerous position in performing his work.

Where a servant voluntarily and unnecessarily places himself in an obviously dangerous position in performing his work, he assumes the risk incident to the dangerous position in which he places himself and cannot recover for injuries sustained thereby,[91] even though the same services have been performed at other times by other employees in the same place,[92] and especially where the servant acts in disobedience of orders.[93] Nevertheless, it has been held that a servant is not precluded from recovering for injuries received in a hazardous position voluntarily and unnecessarily taken, when it is not the normal, but a new and unknown condition, that proximately results in injury.[94]

j. Failure to Give Notice of Dangerous Position

A servant assumes the risk of injury where in the discharge of his duties he places himself in a dangerous position and fails to give notice thereof.

A servant who, in the discharge of his duties, places himself in a dangerous position and fails to give notice thereof to the master or other servant assumes the risk of injury from his failure to do so, the danger being obvious.[95]

§ 391. Defects or Dangers of Which Servant Has Equal or Greater Means of Knowledge than Master

Where the servant accepts or continues in employment, knowing or having equal means of knowledge with the master of the defects and dangers inherent in employment, he assumes the risk of injury therefrom.

Except as statutory regulations may otherwise provide,[96] the general rule is that, where the servant accepts or continues in employment, knowing or having equal means of knowledge with the master of the defects and dangers inherent in the employment, he assumes the risk of injury therefrom,[97] even though the work might have been made safer by the master,[98] the reason being that, under the circumstances, master and servant stand on a footing of equality.[99] For even stronger reasons, the servant accepts the risk where, from the nature of the employment and his duty in connection therewith, he has better knowledge or means

In Missouri

(1) In servant's action for injuries from collapse of ladder alleged to have been of improper type and weight for the work being done, an instruction that, if the ladder was comparatively new and reasonably inspected by defendant when purchased and its condition was as open and obvious to the servant as to the employer, then danger incident to its use was assumed by plaintiff, was erroneous.—Sheppard v. of knowledge of the dangers of the employment than the master himself.[1] It has also been held that the servant assumes the risk of injury where he and the master are equally ignorant of the defects and dangers incident to the work, and where the defects or danger would not have been discovered by the master in the exercise of reasonable care for the servant's safety.[2]

Although the master and servant are equally ignorant of the defect which caused the injury, the servant does not assume the risk where the ignorance of the master is due to his negligent failure to discharge his duty for the safety of the servant.[3] So the doctrine that a servant, having equal or better means of knowledge of the defects and dangers of the employment than the employer, assumes the risk has no application unless the servant is of sufficient discretion, maturity, or experience to appreciate the dangers incident to the work.[4] It has also been held that, if the defects and dangers are latent only and discoverable by inspection, there can be no assumption of risk by the servant.[5]

Defects discoverable by inspector. Since a master must search for hidden defects in appliances furnished the servant, and since the servant need only take notice of such defects as are open to ordinary observation, as considered supra §§ 246, 381, the fact that a defect was discoverable by an inspector of the master did not show that it was equally open to the observation of the servant.[6]

Under the Federal Employers' Liability Act. In actions under the Federal Employers' Liability Act prior to the amendment of August 11, 1939, chapter 685 § 1, 45 U.S.C.A. § 54, an employee did not assume a risk created by the employer's negligence merely because he had as good an opportunity as the employer of knowing of its existence.[7]

§ 392. Latent Defects and Dangers

a. In general
b. Risks arising after commencement of service
c. Methods of work
d. Place for work
e. Machinery, tools, and appliances

a. In General

The servant ordinarily does not assume the risk of injury from latent defects and dangers.

Since, in the absence of knowledge, actual or constructive, to the contrary, the servant has the right to assume that the master has exercised due care for the servant's safety, and the servant, unless the contract so provides, is not charged with the duty of inspecting the place of work, tools, appliances, and instrumentalities furnished for work by the master for the purpose of discovering defects and dangers, as considered supra §§ 380, 381, it necessarily follows that the servant ordinarily does not assume the risk of injury from latent defects and dangers, that is to say, defects and dangers of which he had no knowledge and appreciation, and of which he could have acquired no knowledge by the exercise of ordinary care in performing the services for which he was employed,[8] but only by

Risks as ordinary risk

(1) Risks of injury from latent defects are not assumed by servant as risks ordinarily incident to employment.—Erickson v. Edward Rutledge Timber Co., 203 P. 1078, 34 Idaho 754—39 C.J. p 774 note 97, p 779 note 62.

investigation and inspection for the purpose of ascertaining whether danger existed.[9] The law does not charge a servant with knowledge of defects or dangers which are not open and obvious.[10] In other words, the servant assumes only such risks as are incident to open and obvious defects and dangers and which he either knows and appreciates or should know of.[11] The assumption of risk against hidden defects or dangers requires notice a reasonable time before the accident.[12]

A well established exception to the rule relating to assumption of risk of injury from latent defects is that the servant assumes the risk of injury from latent defects which the master does not know of and could not have discovered by the exercise of ordinary care.[13] This, it has been said, is "a misadventure falling among the casualties incident to the business, and for which no one could be blamed."[14] In other words, it is one of the ordinary risks of the employment.[15] Even in cases where the defects which caused the injury were not known to either master or servant, and were not discoverable by an ordinary inspection, the master is liable if the defects are such that they resulted from want of ordinary care and diligence on the part of the master in procuring the making of the instrumentalities used by the servant, or continuing them in use beyond the time when they could be safely used.[16]

b. Risks Arising after Commencement of Service

The servant does not assume the risks of injury from latent defects arising in, or changes made in, the place of work, machinery, tools, or appliances after the servant has entered on his employment and which increase the hazard of the service.

There is no assumption of risks of injury from defects arising in, or changes made in, the place of work, machinery, tools, or appliances, after the servant has entered on his employment, and which increase the hazard of the service, where he has no knowledge of such defects or changes, or where they are not so open and obvious as to charge him with knowledge of their existence and of the risk of injury therefrom.[17] In general, the servant has the right to presume that the hazards of the service will not be increased without warning either of the danger or of the existence of the newly created condition from which the danger would be obvious to one of ordinary intelligence.[18]

c. Methods of Work

The servant does not assume the risk of injury from unknown or latent dangers in the methods of work as it is performed in the operation of the master's business.

Where the master has adopted or permitted imperfect and dangerous methods of work, the servant does not assume the risk unless it appears that he knew of the custom to perform the work in that

(2) Ordinary risks generally see supra §§ 371–378.

Scientific knowledge

Risks which are obvious only to those possessing scientific knowledge are not chargeable to a servant, and the ordinary servant, in absence of a warning by the master, will not be presumed to have knowledge of such scientific principles.

manner,[19] and unless the methods used are so obviously unsafe that a reasonably prudent man would not attempt to use them,[20] or as otherwise expressed, unless the danger is so obvious, imminent, and certain of disastrous results as to make it incumbent on the servant to quit work.[21]

Selection of more hazardous method. The fact that the master had furnished one way of doing the work which was reasonably safe does not establish the assumption of risk by a servant in doing the work in another way, unless the dangers of the way in which the servant attempted to do the work were known to him, or could have been ascertained by the exercise of reasonable care.[22]

d. Place for Work

(1) In general

(2) Railroad tracks or roadbeds and obstructions

(1) In General

A servant ordinarily does not assume the risk of injury from latent defects and dangers in his place of work.

In accordance with the general rule, as considered supra subdivision a of this section, a servant does not assume the risk of injury from latent defects and dangers in his place of work, that is to say, defects and dangers of which he has no knowledge and appreciation and of which he could have acquired no knowledge by the exercise of ordinary care in performing the services for which he was employed.[23]

Mining. Where a servant engaged in the work of mining has no actual knowledge of the defects or dangers in the place of work and could not, in the exercise of ordinary care, have discovered them and appreciated the risk of injury therefrom, he cannot be charged with an assumption of the risk.[24]

Excavations. Where the danger of injury from excavation work was not known by the servant or was not so open and obvious that the law would charge him with knowledge thereof, he does not assume the risk of injury therefrom.[25] The mere fact that the servant knew there was some danger will not bar a recovery if the danger was not imminent and not of such a character that a person of ordinary prudence would not have assumed the risk.[26]

(2) Railroad Tracks or Roadbeds and Obstructions

A servant does not assume the risk of injury from latent defects or dangers in a railroad track or roadbed.

Under the rule, as discussed supra subdivision d (1) of this section, unless defects or dangers in a railroad track or roadbed are known to the servant, or are so open and obvious that he should have known of them and understood and appreciated the risk of injury therefrom, he does not assume the risk,[27] and, as discussed supra § 359, it has been said that, under the amendment of August 11, 1939, chapter 685 § 1, 45 U.S.C.A. § 54, to the Federal Employers' Liability Act, the defense of assumption of risk has been abolished as to a negligent employer.

The rule that the servant does not assume the risk of injury from latent defects in a railroad track or roadbed has been applied where the injury was sustained by reason of the absence of a derailing or other safety device at a particularly dangerous point on the line,[28] bridges improperly constructed and in disrepair,[29] a defectively constructed fill,[30] a defective plank crossing over switch tracks,[31] a defectively constructed street railway curve, the defect in which was discernible only by measurement and technical calculation,[32] defective ties and rails,[33] defective turntables,[34] hole in track or right of way,[35] a sliver detached from a rail,[36] and unblocked switches.[37]

Obstruction on, over, or near track or roadbed. Where a servant does not know of obstructions on, over, or near a railroad track or roadbed or, knowing of such obstructions, does not know and appreciate the nature and extent of the danger therefrom, although acting in the exercise of ordinary care, he does not assume the risk of injury;[38] and this is so, although the structure causing the injury is of a permanent character.[39] In order to charge the servant with assumption of risk, it must be shown that the servant had either actual or constructive knowledge of the existence of the obstruction and also of the danger caused thereby.[40] Mere knowledge of the existence and general location of the obstruction will not be sufficient to charge the servant with assumption of risk.[41] It has also been held that the circumstances at the time of the injury must have been such as not to excuse a reasonably prudent person from having the memory of the peril within the immediate field of his consciousness.[42]

These principles have been applied where the injuries sustained were caused by awnings projecting from a station house,[43] bridge girders,[44] cars on adjacent tracks,[45] cattle chutes,[46] cattle guards,[47] cattle guard fences,[48] coal bins,[49] overhead bridges,[50] piles of lumber placed near a switch track contrary to custom,[51] piles of stones placed near the track,[52] rails concealed by grass and weeds,[53] signal posts,[54] switch stands,[55] telegraph poles,[56] and water tanks.[57]

e. Machinery, Tools, and Appliances

A servant does not assume the risk of injury from latent defects, and dangers in machinery, tools, or appliances furnished by the master.

In accordance with the general rules, as considered supra subdivision a of this section, the servant does not assume the risk of injury from latent defects in machinery, tools, or appliances furnished by the master, that is to say, he does not assume the risk of injury from defects in machinery, tools, or appliances where he has no knowledge of the defects or of the dangers arising therefrom, and could not have acquired such knowledge, although acting in the exercise of ordinary care in the performance

4. Continuing Work after Knowledge of Danger

§ 393. Without Notice or Complaint

As a general rule a servant who, with knowledge of defects or dangers, voluntarily continues his work without complaint and without a promise by the master to remedy the defects or remove the dangers assumes the risk of injury.

Although, as discussed supra § 380, a servant has the right to rely on the performance by his master of the duties imposed on him by law for the protection of his servants, as a general rule, in the absence of a statute to the contrary, where a servant knows, or is charged with knowledge, of defects and dangers in prosecuting the master's work, and continues in the master's employment voluntarily and without complaint, and without any promise by the master that the defect will be remedied or the danger removed, he assumes the risk of any injuries which may result from such defect.[89] This rule has been held to apply notwithstanding the neg-

In Missouri

(1) Where a servant continues in a master's employment, knowing that such master is negligent, and is later injured because of such negligence, there is no assumption of risk; the question is whether the servant is guilty of contributory negligence in remaining in such employment.—Jewell v. the use of servants in coming to and going from their work;[98] defective machinery;[99] defective tools and appliances or instrumentalities for work,[1] although there is also authority to the contrary of this proposition;[2] failure to furnish appliances essential to servants' safety;[3] insufficiency of force for work;[4] and unguarded machinery.[5]

Time for notice or complaint. It has frequently been held that a servant, after learning of the risks, is entitled to time and opportunity for making complaint.[6]

Hiring for limited time. It has been held that the employee's failure to complain does not necessarily charge him with assumption of risk, where his services are hired for a limited time and he has no right to terminate his contract at will.[7]

Work under emergency or necessity. As a general rule the doctrine of assumption of risk does not apply where the servant is met or confronted with an emergency which does not afford him the opportunity to exercise his option or election to remain in the employment and proceed with the work of the master, since the doctrine of assumption of risk is based on this principle.[8] In order to be absolved from the assumption of risk by reason of an emergency the danger must in fact be imminent and adequate to prevent the exercise of judgment by the employee.[9] It has also been held, however, that the operation of the rule is not affected by the fact that the servant continued in a place of danger to save fellow servants from injury.[10]

It has been held that if at the time of the injury the servant is so situated that he has no choice but continues the service from necessity, he does not assume the attendant risk.[11]

Defects or dangers known to master. Another limitation of the rule, particularly where a statute so provides, is that, where a defect or danger is caused by the master's negligence, and is known by him, or by some one representing him, he cannot rely on the servant's failure to make complaint after learning thereof.[12] Where the defect or danger is known to the master, the servant is relieved of giving notice, although he may not know that the master knew of the defect or danger.[13]

Servant is not expected to act with that degree of prudence which would otherwise be obligatory where confronted by serious danger without sufficient time to deliberate on comparative safety of alternative courses of action, and where alarm and nervous excitement produced by situation impair servant's reasoning faculties.—Hice v. § 394. —— Effect of Statutes

The rule which absolves a master of liability for injury to a servant who, with knowledge of defects or dangers, continues to work without complaint or a promise to remedy the defects has been changed or abrogated by some statutes.

The rule which absolves a master of liability for injury to a servant who, with knowledge of defects or dangers, continues to work without complaint or a promise to remedy the defects or remove the dangers has been changed or abrogated by some statutes.[14] The Federal Employers' Liability Act, at least in cases prior to the amendment of August 11, 1939, chapter 685 § 1, 45 U.S.C.A. § 54, which, as discussed supra § 359, is said to have abolished the doctrine of assumption of risk, did not affect the operation of the rule[15] except in case of a violation by a common carrier of a federal statute enacted for the safety of the employee which contributed to the injury complained of, in which circumstances the defense of assumption of risk was not available irrespective of the servant's knowledge and appreciation of the defects and dangers, and of his continuing in the employment without complaint and without any promise to remedy the defects.[16]

§ 395. After Notice or Complaint to Master

As a general rule the fact that a servant has complained of defects and dangers does not absolve him of the assumption of risk, in the absence of any assurance or promise by the master that the defects and dangers will be removed.

In the absence of statute providing otherwise,[17] the fact that a servant has complained of defects and dangers will not relieve him of the assumption of risk if he continues to work without any assurance or promise by the master that the defects and dangers will be removed,[18] and this is particularly true where the employee in continuing his work is not acting under compulsion or in any emergency[19] or where he is told that no change will be made.[20] It has been held, however, that, where the fact that machinery is unfit for use is brought to the attention of the master, the servant is absolved from increased risk if the danger is not such that none but a reckless person would continue to use the machinery.[21]

Absence of duty to report dangers

Under some statutes assumption of risk is no defense where it does not appear that by the terms of the employment it was the duty of the employee to report the unsafe condition and that he failed to do so, and the employer was not otherwise possessed of knowledge thereof.—McKee v. Defects which have been reported

(1) A statute providing that if a defect in the ways, works, and machinery has been reported to one whose duty it is to remedy it, and the defect is not remedied within a reasonable time, and by reason of the defect a servant is injured, he shall not be held to have assumed the risk of such injury, takes away absolutely the defense of assumption of risk arising from dangers or defects which came into existence subsequent to the contract of service, if reported as required by the statute, but it does not affect the assumption of risk of injury from defects or dangers existing at the time of entering the employment or require the adoption of safer methods or the installation of more improved machinery on complaint of the employer independently of the length of time the method or machinery had been in use.—Wood v. Danas, 120 N.E. 159, 230 Mass. 587.

(2) The statute deprives the employer of the defense of voluntary assumption of risk, where the employee has reported a defect which there was an existing duty to remedy, and which was not remedied within a reasonable time, but does not create a duty to remedy defects where no such duty previously existed.—Beggelman v. Romanow, 192 N.E. 159, 288 Mass. 14.

Written notice

c. Form and sufficiency of notice or complaint
d. Form and sufficiency of promise
e. Necessity for reliance on promise
f. Duration of continuance in employment

a. General Rule

As a general rule, where the master promises to repair the defect complained of, the servant does not assume the risk by continuing to work for a reasonable time thereafter unless the danger is so patent that no prudent person would continue to work.

As a general rule, where the master or his representative promises to remedy the defect complained of, the servant by continuing in his employment for a reasonable time after such promise does not assume the risk of injury from the defect unless the danger is so patent that no person of ordinary prudence would continue to work,[22] and this is true even though the servant could make the repairs himself or dispense with the appliance which needs repairs.[23] The fact that the master had other reasons than the safety of employees for making the change will not render the promise to make the change ineffectual.[24] The rule is not superseded by a statute relieving the employee from risks incident to remaining in the employment, on his giving written notice of a defect causing the injury, but confers an additional right.[25] By reason of the promise to repair, the servant's implied contract to assume the risk of the danger is temporarily suspended,[26] and the master himself temporarily assumes the risk of injury to the servant,[27] unless, it has been held, the danger arising therefrom is so glaringly obvious that no prudent man would undertake it even under the direction and promise of the employer.[28]

Even though a promise to repair is made by the master, the servant is still bound to exercise such care as a man of ordinary prudence, caution, and skill would exercise if placed in a similar position,[29] at least in the absence of an order by the employer to the employee to continue work.[30]

It has been said that the word "defect," as applied to a master's liability for injuries to a servant resulting from failure to remedy a defect on complaint by the servant, means any condition inconsistent with ordinary care,[31] and it has further been held that a master's promise to make additions or changes in a place of work or in a machine required by the accepted standards of prudence will be as efficacious to repel assumption of risk as a promise to repair.[32] Where the defect promised to be remedied was not the cause of the accident, and the fulfillment of his promise would not have prevented it, the master is not liable.[33]

The general rule applies whether the complaint is based on defects and dangerous conditions in the place of work[34] or ways[35] or in the tools, machinery, appliances, or instrumentalities for work,[36] on the insufficiency of the force for work,[37] on the failure to provide adequate regulations for carrying on the work,[38] or on the incompetency[39] or unfitness by reason of negligence[40] of a coemployee, or on the want of fitness of the appliances furnished for the work.[41]

b. Limitations and Exceptions to Rule

The rule under which a promise by the master to remove a defect or danger relieves the employee from the assumption of risks has been held not to apply where no increased danger from continued use of defective appliances is contemplated by either the master or the servant, where the defect relates to matters as to which the master is not obligated to act in the first instance, where the defective tool is a simple one, or where the danger is obvious and imminent.

It is not in all cases that the servant may relieve himself from the assumption of risk incident to defects and dangers of which he has full knowledge by exacting from the master a promise to repair.[42] The general rule has been held inapplicable where neither the master nor the servant contemplates any increased danger to the latter from the continued use of the defective appliance;[43] and, where the promise is to repair after the completion of the work on hand, the servant assumes the risk of injury until such time by continuing at work.[44]

The rule is likewise inapplicable to impose liability on the master where the promise relates to matters as to which the master is not obligated to act[45] unless a new contract of service, modifying the original contract, has been affected by which the employer agrees to remedy the defect;[46] nor does the rule apply where machinery or appliances are not in fact defective, as such a promise is without consideration and does not give rise to any duty not recognized by law,[47] or where the promise is not to repair a defect, but to substitute a safer appliance in the place of one which is not defective.[48] It has also been held that the promise creates liability only as to those risks which are created by the master's negligence and of which the servant has no knowledge, and it does not create liability as to risks inherently pertaining to the work and which remain after the master has fully performed his duty.[49]

A promise to remedy a defect has been held to relieve the servant from assumption of the risk only while engaged within the scope of the employment with reference to which the promise was made; if he undertakes other duties, under special order of the foreman, and with knowledge of the danger, he assumes the risk.[50]

Simple tools or appliances. There is a conflict of authority as to whether the rule applies to a promise to remedy defects in simple tools and appliances.[51] Some decisions have drawn a distinction between complex and simple tools and have held that the rule does not apply where the defective tools are ordinary or common tools or appliances with which the employee is entirely familiar and where he has as good or a better opportunity as the employer to know their condition.[52] Other decisions, however, have made no such distinction, and have applied the rule to simple as well as to complex tools.[53]

Imminence of danger. Notwithstanding the promise of the master, where the danger is so obvious and imminent that no prudent person would undertake to perform the service, the servant is not justified in continuing in the performance of his services and assumes the risk of any injury which he may sustain.[54]

c. Form and Sufficiency of Notice or Complaint

In order for a servant to be relieved from the assumption of risk arising from known defects by a complaint and a promise to remove such defects, the complaint must have been made to the master or to someone charged with the duty of remedying defects, and the servant must have made it known to the master that he was unwilling to continue with his work unless the defects were repaired.

Although it is necessary that a servant on discovering defects should intend to quit work unless the defects are remedied in order to relieve himself of the assumption of risk,[55] if by any act or expression the servant makes known to the master or one duly authorized to represent him the fact that he is unwilling to continue in the employment unless defects are repaired this will be sufficient;[56] there need be no formal statement that he apprehends danger to himself from the defects and that he will leave unless they are remedied;[57] but this at least is necessary.[58] Where the servant does not make the report in apprehension of any danger to himself, he assumes the risk.[59]

To whom made. In order to be sufficient, a complaint must be made to the master or his vice principal, or to some one charged with the duty of remedying defects, and not to a fellow servant.[60] The notice may be effectively given to one whom the employee has reasonable grounds to believe has authority to receive it.[61]

d. Form and Sufficiency of Promise

The promise to remedy defects must be definite and certain, and made with a view to inducing the servant to continue work.

The promise which it is necessary for the master to make with respect to remedying the defects or removing the danger complained of,[62] in order to be sufficient, must be definite and certain,[63] and must be made with a view to the servant's safety and as an inducement to him to continue work.[64] If it is for the purpose only of making the work less difficult to the employee, or more profitable to him, or of enabling him to do more work or better work, it would not have the effect of relieving the employee of an assumed risk.[65] The promise may, however, be implied as well as express,[66] general as well as individual;[67] it is not necessary that a definite time for making the repairs should be fixed, as a reasonable time will be implied, in the absence of an express agreement.[68]

A servant may not rely on a promise to repair made to a fellow servant unless he is informed of it,[69] and a promise to repair a certain defect will not relieve the servant from assuming the risk of injury from other defects which he knew were dangerous if he continues to work with such knowledge.[70]

Second promise. A servant has the same right to rely on a second promise to repair as he had a right to rely on the first.[71]

By whom made. The promise, in order to relieve the servant from the assumption of risk, must be generally made by the master or one authoritatively standing in his place.[72] A promise of a vice principal or duly authorized representative of the mas-

Promise to see what could be done
Statement after complaint by employees that a fellow servant had been throwing bobbins around the room, that he would see what could be done, was a sufficient promise to relieve employee of implied assumption of risk by remaining at work, notwithstanding the words promised nothing more than an investigation, since the words were uttered for purpose of satisfying the complaints and would be construed against the speaker as being an undertaking to do whatever investigation showed to be necessary to correct the danger.—Coughlin v. Promise by wife of master
Where domestic servant had complained of defect to her mistress, and the mistress promised to tell her husband and have him remove the ter is as binding as the promise of the master himself.[73] Where the person who made the promise had apparent authority to do so, and the injured servant believed with good reason that he had such authority, the master will be bound by the promise.[74]

e. Necessity for Reliance on Promise

In order that a servant may be relieved from the operation of the doctrine of assumed risk from a defect complained of and the danger of which he was no longer willing to incur, it is essential that his remaining in the employment was induced by the promise of the master to remedy the defect.

Except as otherwise provided by statute,[75] in order that a servant may be relieved from the operation of the doctrine of assumed risk from a defect complained of and the danger of which he was no longer willing to incur, it is essential that his remaining in the employment was induced by the promise of the master to remedy the defect, when he would not otherwise have done so.[76] If for any other reason the servant continues in the employment the master is not liable for the injuries sustained in so doing,[77] because the promise would have no effect to create a new relation.[78]

f. Duration of Continuance in Employment

Where no time is fixed by the promise to make repairs, the servant may continue working for a reasonable time only if he is to be relieved of the assumption of risk. Ordinarily, where the master fixes a definite time within which a defect will be repaired, the servant may continue working for such time, but no longer, if he is to be relieved of the assumption of risk.

Where no definite time is fixed for making repairs the law implies a reasonable time, during which time the employee does not assume the risk.[79] If, however, the servant remains in the service longer than a reasonable time after the master's promise to repair the defect he will be held to have assumed the risk.[80] In some cases it has been held that what is a reasonable time is to be determined by the time which might reasonably be required by the master in which to make the repairs,[81] while in others it is held that the servant is entitled to remain for any period which will not preclude the reasonable expectation that the promise will be kept.[82]

Where the master fixes a definite time within which the repair is to be made, the servant may wait until the expiration of the time named.[83] Or-defect, but there was no showing that the promise was brought home to the husband, he was not liable to servant for injuries thereafter sustained.—Liptak v. Karsner, 293 N.W. 612, 208 Minn. 168.

dinarily, if he continues in the employment after the expiration of the time fixed without repairs being made, he assumes the risk,[84] since he can no longer be considered as relying on the promise.[85] There are decisions however, which recognize that under certain circumstances the "fixed time" may imply some grace beyond the day named.[86] The time specified for making repairs cannot be said to have expired, even though the hour fixed for making the repairs had passed where the injury occurred on the servant's use of the appliances after the time for repairs had expired, and before the servant could have known that the repairs had not been made.[87]

§ 397. Continuance in Employment in Consideration of Increase in Wages

If a servant continues working in consideration of an increase of wages, he assumes the risk of danger from known defects, notwithstanding a prior promise to remedy the defects.

Where a servant with knowledge of the danger arising from the use of defective instrumentalities for doing the work continues in the service in consideration of an increase of wages, he assumes the risk resulting from the defects notwithstanding a prior promise to remedy such defects.[88]

5. Compliance with Commands or Threats

§ 398. Absence of Knowledge and Appreciation of Danger

As a general rule a servant does not assume the risks incident to the performance of his work where he acts in compliance with the commands or threats of the master, without knowledge of the dangers.

It is a rule of very general application that a servant who is acting under the commands or threats of his master does not assume the risk of injury incident to the act,[89] and it has been held that especially is this true where the order of the master is repeated in an urgent manner and the servant is not given an opportunity to reflect.[90] The rule, however, does not apply where the act involves a violation of law,[91] or where, as discussed infra § 401, the servant knows and ap-

Statutory exception inapplicable

The provision of a statute absolving a servant from the assumption of risks in cases of negligence by the employer which excepts from its operation conductors and engineers voluntarily operating unsafe cars has been held to be inapplicable in a case where an engineer was directed against his own judgment to clean a locomotive with a defective hose, it being considered in such case that the engineer was not voluntarily operating the engine.—Hercules Powder Co. v. preciates the danger, or where the danger is so obvious and imminent that no person of ordinary prudence would be willing to encounter it even under orders or threats from one having authority over him. The fact that the servant was in immediate charge of the work will not constitute an assumption of risk where his charge was subject to the direction of his superior.[92] The negligence of the master who directs the servant to do work need not be gross in order to authorize a recovery by the servant on the theory of nonassumption of risk.[93] On the other hand, it has been held that the fact that the servant acts under the master's direct orders is insufficient to excuse the servant from making a choice and assuming the risk if he continues to work,[94] but that if there is also an emergency which in a practical way shuts out the opportunity of choice the risk is not voluntarily incurred, at least if the emergency is due to the master's fault.[95]

Where, by virtue of statute or otherwise, an employee does not assume risks arising from the negligence of the employer, an employee does not assume the risk of injury from complying with a negligent order or command,[96] even though the employee may be as competent as the employer to judge the safety of doing the work as required.[97]

An exception to the general rule is recognized where the servant, although acting in obedience to a command of the master, selects his own method of doing the work.[98] However, the rule under which a servant is said to assume the risk of injury where he knowingly selects the more hazardous method of doing the work, as discussed supra § 390, has been held not to apply where the servant received specific directions from the master to employ the unsafe method.[99] Accordingly, if the servant is directed by his employer to perform his duties in the dangerous way, the master becomes liable for injuries due to any extraordinary or unusual dangers unknown to the servant.[1]

The general rule has been applied in respect of dangerous methods of work,[2] places for work,[3] passways,[4] and tools, machinery, and appliances;[5] and also in respect of a failure to enforce rules for the safety of the servant.[6]

Basis of rule. Ordinarily it is the duty of the servant to obey the commands of the master[7] unless the danger in obeying is so obvious that no person in the exercise of ordinary care would undertake to do so,[8] and he is not required to set up his own judgment against that of the master,[9] or look out for latent defects[10] and make an inspection of the place of work before obeying the master's commands.[11] Where the command is sudden or the situation gives little time for reflection or deliberation, the employee need not weigh the degree of danger and decide for himself whether it is safe for him to act.[12] The master's command or direction constitutes an implied assurance that the servant will not be exposed to unnecessary peril and that the work which he is directed to do may be done with reasonable safety.[13] Unless the danger is so obvious that no prudent man would incur it under like circumstances,[14] in the absence of knowledge to the contrary the servant is entitled to rely on the superior knowledge and judgment of the master[15] and on the assurance so given,[16] from which the law implies a new agreement to have been made whereby the master relieves the servant of his former assumption.[17]

§ 399. —— Remaining in Service after Notice or Complaint

A servant ordered to proceed after complaining to the master of a defect or danger of which he has knowledge does not assume the risk unless he fully appreciates the dangers, or unless the danger is so manifest that a prudent person would not incur it.

Where a servant has knowledge of a defect or danger, and calls the attention of the master to it, but is ordered to proceed with the work, he will not be held to have assumed the risk of so doing,[18] particularly where the master has promised to make repairs,[19] unless as discussed infra § 402, he is fully aware of the dangers to be incurred in obeying the master's order, or unless the danger is so manifest, obvious, and imminent that a person of ordinary prudence and caution would not incur it.

§ 400. —— Requisites and Sufficiency of Command

In order for a command or order to relieve a servant from the assumption of risk, it must be given by the master or an authorized representative, and be clear, unequivocal, and specific.

The general rule, discussed supra § 398, under which a servant is absolved from the assumption of risk if he acts in compliance with commands or threats of the master, applies as well when the command, order, or threat is given by a vice principal or other authorized agent as when it is given by the master;[20] but where the order is given by a fellow servant, or other person without authority to do so, the servant is not thereby relieved of the assumption of risk in complying with the order,[21] especially where in obeying the order the servant disobeys rules for work promulgated by the master.[22]

The order must be clear and unequivocal[23] and specific.[24] If the order is merely to do work incident to the service, in the way usual to the servant, he is not relieved of the assumption of risk by the order.[25] Where an order is nothing more in effect than a general direction to perform certain work, without requiring the work to be done in any particular manner, but leaving the method to be pursued to the discretion of the servant, the order will not impose on the master any greater responsibility than he ordinarily incurs, or relieve the servant of the assumption of risk if the circumstances attending the performance of the work are such as, without the order, would impose on the servant the assumption of risk.[26] An ordinary administrative direction as to use a way given by one who is not so located as to know its condition has been held not to relieve the servant from assumption of risk in carrying out such direction.[27] A general order to hurry up the work does not relieve the employee from his assumption of risk.[28]

§ 401. Effect of Knowledge and Appreciation of Danger

a. In general
b. Servant's fear of losing employment
c. Overexertion on part of servant

a. In General

Where the servant knows and appreciates the danger of the work he undertakes or the danger incident thereto is so obvious and imminent that an ordinarily prudent man would not undertake the work, he assumes the risk although the work is undertaken by virtue of express commands or threats of the master.

Where the servant knows and appreciates the danger of the work he undertakes or the danger incident thereto is so obvious and imminent that an ordinarily prudent man would not undertake the work, he assumes the risk although the work is undertaken by virtue of express commands or threats of the master;[29] and especially is this true where the servant has been warned of the danger and given particular instructions how to do the work.[30] Having this knowledge and appreciation, the servant cannot be said to rely on the assurance that the danger does not exist[31] and has no right to assume that in obeying orders he will not be subjected to unnecessary peril and that the work which he is commanded to do may be performed with reasonable safety.[32] On the other hand, the mere fact that the servant knows that there is some danger will not defeat his right to recover if in obeying he has acted with ordinary care under the circumstances.[33] It has also been said that in determining whether a servant assumed the risk of obeying his master's orders and continuing in service after knowledge of the danger in so doing, the degree of danger, the extent of the employer's appreciation thereof, and the necessity of doing the work are to be considered,[34] and that there is no absolute rule for determining the question,[35] although generally the servant does not assume the risk unless the danger is so obvious that one of ordinary prudence would not incur it.[36] When a servant continues to work with an appliance under a peremptory order of the employer, although knowing the dangers incident to its use, it has been held that the employer is estopped to assert the defense of assumption of risk,[37] whether or not such order was accompanied by an assurance of safety.[38]

The general rule has been applied frequently in respect of dangerous or defective machinery, tools, and appliances,[39] places of work,[40] insufficient force for work,[41] negligence of other servants,[42] and also in respect of dangerous methods of work.[43]

Use of physical force by master. Where actual or constructive physical force is used to compel a servant to do the work, he does not assume the risk although he fully knows and appreciates the dangers involved.[44]

b. Servant's Fear of Losing Employment

The general rule is that if the servant undertakes the performance of work, the danger of which he fully comprehends, the fact that he undertakes it unwillingly and for fear of losing his employment, or of incurring the displeasure of the master, will not relieve him of the assumption of risk incident thereto.

According to the weight of authority, if the servant undertakes the performance of work, the danger of which he fully comprehends, the fact that he undertakes it unwillingly and for fear of losing his employment[45] or of incurring the displeasure of the master[46] will not relieve him of the assumption of risk incident thereto; but there is also authority to the contrary.[47]

c. Overexertion on Part of Servant

A servant has been held to assume the risk of injury by overexertion although he does the work under the express order of the master.

The rule, discussed supra § 390, that a servant assumes the risk of injury to himself, sustained by reason of his overtaxing his strength or powers of endurance in doing the work for which he was employed, where the occasion presented no emergency requiring hasty action, has been held to apply notwithstanding the servant does the work under the express command of the master,[48] at least where no assurance of safety has been given and nothing has been said which is likely to mislead or misrepresent the situation.[49] It has also been held, however, that where the cause of the injury is the failure of the employer to furnish sufficient help, he is not relieved from liability for an injury resulting from overexertion on work done pursuant to orders, after protest by the employee or a request by him for additional help.[50] This has been held especially true where the command to do the work is accompanied by a threat of discharge on failure of the employee to obey the command.[51]

If the employee acts under orders in an emergency for the purpose of preventing loss of life or property[52] or otherwise without opportunity to deliberate or consider the danger to himself,[53] he has been held to be relieved from the assumption of risk from overexertion.

If a servant fully appreciates the dangers involved he assumes the risk of complying with the master's order after complaining of the defects or dangers.

Although the servant has given notice and complained of the defect or danger, he assumes the risk where he is fully aware of, and appreciates, the danger to be incurred in obeying the master's order,[54] or where the danger in obeying the master's order is so manifest, obvious, and imminent that a person of ordinary prudence and caution would not incur it;[55] and this is true although the servant does the work under protest[56] and although he was told that disobedience of the order would result in his discharge.[57] Even the direct and immediate order of the master will not justify a servant in rashly exposing himself to a known and obvious danger.[58]

§ 403. Effect of Equal or Superior Knowledge of Servant

A servant has been held to assume the risk of obeying the master's orders if he has equal or better means of knowledge than the master of the danger of so doing.

It has been held that where the servant has equal or better means of knowledge than the master of the danger of obeying the master's order, he assumes the risk of so doing.[59] It is only where the servant is misled by the order that the exception to the doctrine of assumption of risk exists.[60]

6. ASSURANCES OR REPRESENTATIONS OF MASTER

As a general rule an assurance of safety by the master absolves the servant of the assumption of risk, unless the danger is so obvious and imminent that an ordinarily prudent person would not do the work.

A servant does not assume the risk of injury from dangers incident to his employment or from defects in the place of work, tools, machinery, or appliances where, with or without complaint by the servant, the master or his representative has assured him that the work may be done safely,[61] or has promised to take precautions to protect the servant from injury while working,[62] unless, as hereinafter discussed in this section, the danger of doing the work is so obvious and imminent that a person of ordinary prudence would not have attempted it, or unless there is a showing of a new condition following the assurance of the master that would bring the servant within the general rule governing assumption of risk.[63] The rule is not limited to youthful or inexperienced servants,[64] and it may apply where there is doubt in the servant's mind as to the safety of doing the work,[65] or even where he knows that there is some danger.[66] Where assurances of this

Conflicting orders

When confronted with the conflicting orders of a superior and one who is merely temporarily acting as such, the employee must rely on the order of the superior, or assume the risks, when he is in as good a position as the acting superior for ascertaining or understanding the situation.—Lloyd v. Norfolk & W. Ry. Co., 145 S.E. 372, 151 Va. 409.

Reason for rule

Pa.—Moseley v. Reading Co., 145 A. 293, 295 Pa. 342.

(2) An employer cannot lull his employee into a sense of security by an assurance of safety, and then escape liability for injuries resulting to employee because of relying on that assurance, and in such cases employee does not assume the risk.—Neely v. Goldberg, 114 S.W.2d 455, 195 Ark. 790.

Crossing bridge

Where an oil dealer's manager specified route to be taken by employee in delivering truckload of oil and assured employee that private bridge on route was safe and that employee could safely pass over bridge with truck loaded to its full capacity, employee did not assume the risk.—Neely v. Goldberg, supra.

Abrogation of contract

Servant's implied agreement to assume known risks of employment may be abrogated by express or implied agreement to contrary, as where servant complains to master that tool appears to be dangerous and master commands him to proceed with work and assures him there is no danger.—Atlanta, B. & C. Supposition of superior knowledge

Servant may rely on assurance of the master that it is safe for the servant to do the work, on the supposition that the master has superior knowledge.—Blume v. Ballis, supra.

Complaint of others

Where employee did not know condition, he was warranted in believing foreman's statement that it was safe to continue work when others complained, and he did not assume risk. —Pipal v. Grand Trunk Western Ry. Co., 173 N.E. 372, 341 Ill. 320, certiorari denied Grand Trunk Western Ry. Co. v. Pipal, 51 S.Ct. 486, 283 U.S. 838, 75 L.Ed. 1449.

Honest difference of opinion

Employee does not assume risk of employment where there is basis for honest difference of opinion as to safety of instrument furnished by master, or of manner of performing work and servant surrenders his judgment of unsafety in reliance on master's superior judgment.—Hice v. Dobson Lumber Co., 185 S.E. 742, 180 S.C. 259—Scott v. International Agr. Corporation, 184 S.E. 133, 180 S.C. 1.

character have been given, the servant is under no duty to make an inspection for the purpose of "checking up" thereon,[67] or for the purpose of discovering latent defects or dangers.[68]

On the other hand, if the servant is fully aware of the risk he runs in doing the work,[69] or if the work is so obviously dangerous that a person of ordinary prudence would not undertake it,[70] the servant assumes the risk in so doing regardless of any assurances of safety made by the master or his representative, notwithstanding he undertakes the work reluctantly and under a threat of dismissal for failure to do so.[71] It has also generally been held that the servant is not relieved of the assumption of risk by assurances of safety by the master or his representatives where the servant has equal[72] or better[73] means of knowledge than the master.

Reliance on assurances. In order to relieve the servant of assumption of risk, there must be reliance on the assurances.[74] It is not sufficient that the judgment of the master or his representative be merely in confirmation of that of the servant.[75] If the servant does not rely on the assurance, the action stands as if no assurance had been given.[76]

By whom assurances given. In order to have the effect of relieving the servant of assumption of risk, it is essential that the assurances should have been given by the master or by some one who authoritatively represented him.[77] He is not entitled to rely on a representation or assurance made by a fellow servant.[78] However, the assurance to an employee, by another employee having charge of an appliance, that it was all right may be relied on as the assurance of the master.[79]

Simple tools. If the tool and its uses are so simple that any defects in the tool or dangers in its use are equally and obviously apparent to the master and servant, it has been held that an assurance of safety does not relieve the employee of the assumption of risk.[80] It has been held, however, that a servant may rely on the master's assurance that an appliance is not defective, although it is a simple tool.[81]

§ 405. What Constitutes Assurance of Safety

In order to absolve the servant of the assumption of risk, the assurance of safety must be such as reasonably to allay the servant's fears and subordinate his judgment to the superior knowledge of the master.

An assurance of safety which will absolve the servant from the assumption of risk must be such that under the given circumstances it is reasonably calculated to allay his fears and subordinate his judgment to the superior knowledge of the master.[82] It is not necessary, however, that the master shall in terms assure the servant of the safety of the work, it being sufficient if, under the circumstances, his acts and words are in effect an assurance of safety.[83] An assurance of safety may be implied from the nature of the directions given by the master with regard to the work,[84] and it has been held that a failure to warn of danger may be a tacit assurance that no unusual danger is to be apprehended.[85] A mere expression of opinion does not amount to a direction which will absolve the servant from the assumption of risk otherwise assumed.[86]

§ 406. Assurances That Repairs Have Been Made

A servant has the right to rely on assurances that defects of which he has complained have been remedied.

A servant has the right to rely on assurances that defects of which he has complained have been remedied, and is entitled to recover for injuries caused by the failure properly to repair,[87] unless the defects are such as to be apparent to one in the use of ordinary care.[88]

7. Risks outside Scope of Employment

§ 407. In General

The determination of whether a servant assumes the risks of doing work outside the scope of his employment depends to some extent on whether in so working he acts voluntarily or in compliance with the orders of the master, as discussed infra §§ 408, 409. The assumption of such risks by an inexperienced or youthful employee is considered infra § 420.

Examine Pocket Parts for later cases.

§ 408. Voluntary Act of Servant

Where a servant voluntarily exposes himself to risks outside the scope of his regular employment, and is injured thereby, he assumes the risks involved.

Where a servant voluntarily and of his own motion exposes himself to risks outside of the scope of his regular employment, without or against the order of the master or vice principal, and is injured thereby, the master is not liable, since the servant assumes the risks involved[89] where he knows and appreciates the dangers.[90] Especially does this rule apply where the act which resulted in the injury complained of was done by the servant for his own benefit or convenience and not in furtherance of the master's business.[91] It also applies, even though the act done by the servant may result in benefit to the master.[92]

§ 409. Compliance with Commands of Master

As a general rule, a servant does not assume the risk of doing work outside the scope of his employment on order of the master unless he fully appreciates the dangers involved, or unless the dangers are so obvious that a reasonably prudent person would not obey the order.

Where a servant is ordered to perform work outside of the scope of his employment, he will not by obeying the order necessarily assume the risk incident to the work,[93] even, it has been held, if the risks are equally open to the observation of both master and servant.[94] There is no implied agreement that the servant will take on himself the risk incident to such service.[95] Conversely, the mere fact that the servant is injured while performing an act outside of the scope of his employment under the direction of the master or some one representing him will not necessarily give him a cause of action against the master.[96] It has been held that the material question is whether the servant had sufficient experience or knowledge to understand the hazards of the extra work required of him.[97]

As a general rule, where a servant is ordered to perform work outside the scope of his employment, he is absolved from the assumption of risk, and the master is responsible for injuries sustained by the servant while acting in obedience to the order,[98] notwithstanding the servant's obedience to the order is caused by fear of losing his employment,[99] unless the danger of performing the work ordered is known and appreciated by the servant,[1] or is so obvious and imminent that no reasonably prudent person would obey the order, the servant, in such case, being chargeable by operation of law with knowledge and appreciation thereof.[2] The servant has also been held to assume the risks incident to the work, where they are equally open to the observation of the servant and the master.[3] In any event, the servant is freed from the assumption of risk only during such time as is reasonable for him to learn and appreciate the hazards of his new employment.[4]

The servant has the right to assume that the master will be mindful of his duty and not wantonly subject him to peril.[5]

Working in other departments. A servant engaged in one branch of a business cannot be held to have assumed risks arising from other connected branches of the same business,[6] unless the danger is known and appreciated by the servant or should have been known and appreciated by him.[7]

8. Disobedience of Rules, Orders, Instructions, or Statutes, and Use of Appliances for Purposes Not Intended

§ 410. Disobedience of Rules, Orders, Instructions, or Statutes

As a general rule, a servant assumes the risks involved when he violates rules, orders, or instructions of the master of which he has knowledge.

As a general rule, where a servant is injured in consequence of the violation of rules, orders, or instructions of the master, he assumes all the risks incident thereto.[8] The rule does not apply, however, where it is shown that the rule violated by the servant has been waived or abandoned;[9] or in cases where the servant has disregarded rules or instructions which have not been communicated or made known to him.[10] It has also been held that the violation of a rule of the employer does not constitute an assumption of risk,[11] but rather, as discussed infra § 457, to constitute contributory negligence.

Disobedience of statutes. Where a servant is injured in consequence of violating statutory provisions enacted for his safety, he assumes the risk of so doing.[12]

§ 411. Use of Appliances for Purposes Not Intended

A servant assumes the risk of using appliances for purposes for which they were not intended.

Where a servant uses appliances furnished by the master for purposes to which they were not adapted and for which they were obviously not intended, he assumes the risk of injury from so doing.[13]

9. INEXPERIENCED OR YOUTHFUL SERVANT

§ 412. In General

As a general rule the youth or inexperience of a servant does not relieve him of the assumption of risks incident to his employment, if he has the capacity and discretion to comprehend and appreciate the dangers thereof.

While it has been held that the law does not charge a minor with the assumption of risks attendant on employment as a man of mature years,[14] the fact that a servant is a minor, or inexperienced, does not, as a general rule, of itself relieve him of an assumption of the risks incident to the employment which he undertakes.[15] Minors, it is said, like adults, assume the ordinary risks incident to the employment,[16] subject, of course, to the qualification that the servant, although a minor, must be possessed of sufficient capacity and discretion to comprehend and appreciate the dangers of the employment.[17] In determining the question of capacity it is proper and necessary to consider his age, intelligence, and experience,[18] and the nature of the dangers involved.[19] When a master has performed his duty by giving to a youthful or inexperienced servant such reasonable instructions and cautions regarding the dangers of his employment as are best calculated to enable him to avoid injury, as discussed supra § 306, the servant is usually considered to be on the same footing as any other servant, and will be deemed to have assumed the usual and ordinary risks incident to his employment,[20] unless he is too young to realize the danger of the work even after being fully instructed in regard thereto.[21]

§ 413. Master's Knowledge of Age or Inexperience

A master has the right to assume that an adult servant applying for work is qualified to perform the duties of his employment, and is not liable for injuries caused by the servant's inexperience, unless he has been informed thereof.

In the absence of actual knowledge to the contrary,[22] a master has the right to assume that an adult servant applying for work is qualified to perform the duties of his employment and has a knowledge of the risks of such work, and is not liable for injuries caused by the servant's inexperience, unless he has been informed thereof.[23] This is because the act of soliciting employment amounts to an assertion that the servant is competent to perform the service.[24] So, too, it has been held that a master is not liable for injuries to an infant, if the infant's age, intelligence, and experience were such as to induce a man of ordinary care and prudence to believe him qualified for his employment.[25] An inexperienced minor does not assume the risks involved in performing dangerous work, where, notwithstanding the master's knowledge that the minor has never before engaged in such work, he fails to inform the minor of the risks involved.[26]

§ 414. Servant's Knowledge of Defects or Dangers

As a general rule, where a servant by reason of his youth or inexperience is not acquainted with the dangers incident to his employment, he does not assume the risk thereof until the master apprises him of the dangers, and gives him reasonable instruction as to how they may be avoided.

As a general rule, where a servant by reason of his youth or inexperience is not acquainted with the dangers incident to his employment, he does not assume the risk thereof until the master apprises him of the dangers, and gives him reasonable instruction as to how they may be avoided.[27] The mere fact that the servant is willing to undertake the particular work does not relieve the master of the duty to give him proper instructions,[28] as his failure to perform his duty in this regard is not a danger ordinarily incident to the service.[29] Furthermore a young or inexperienced servant will not be held to have assumed the risks of his employment by reason of mere knowledge of the defect or danger, unless he is also aware of the nature and extent of the danger, and has sufficient discretion and capacity to comprehend the risk.[30] On the other hand his youth or inexperience will not excuse him, if he does, or ought to, know and appreciate the danger to which he is exposed;[31] and the lack of instruction or specific warning in regard to the dangers of the employment will not in these circumstances relieve the servant of the assumption of risk.[32] which he has sufficient intelligence to understand and appreciate.

A servant, although under age or inexperienced, assumes all patent and obvious risks of his employment which he has sufficient intelligence to understand and appreciate.[33] Nevertheless, even though the risk is open and obvious, it is not assumed by a young or inexperienced servant unless he is of sufficient discretion and capacity to understand and appreciate it.[34]

§ 416. Comparative Knowledge of Master and Servant

An unskilled servant will not be as readily charged with knowledge of defects as the master, of which neither he nor the master has actual knowledge.

Where neither master nor servant has actual knowledge of a defect in machinery or appliances, but the servant is unskilled, and is not charged with the duty of inspection, knowledge of the defect will not be so readily imputed to him as to the master, on whom rests the duty of inspection.[35]

§ 417. Compliance with Commands or Threats

As a general rule, a youthful or inexperienced servant does not assume the risks where he acts in obedience to orders of the master.

As a general rule, where a young or inexperienced servant is injured while acting in obedience to the commands of, or under the compulsion of threats by, the master, he will not be held to have assumed the risks involved in doing so.[36] He has the right to assume superior knowledge of his employer and that the place and implements for the work directed are safe.[37] He does, however, assume the risk of obeying an order where he knows and appreciates the danger involved in so doing,[38] even though his obedience to the command was caused by fear of losing his employment.[39] The servant will be held to have assumed the risk where the command was given by one having no authority to do so.[40]

§ 418. Failure of Master to Provide Safe Place for Work

A servant whose youth and inexperience disqualify him from encountering the danger does not assume the risk of injury from failure to provide a reasonably safe place for work.

The rule that a servant does not assume the risk of injury due to the failure of the master to exercise reasonable care to furnish him with a reasonably safe place for work, as discussed supra § 363, is especially applicable when the servant by reason of his youth and inexperience is disqualified to encounter the danger.[41]

§ 419. Violation of Statutes Designed for Protection of Minors

As a general rule, assumption of risk as a defense is not available to a master as against a minor employed in violation of a statute prohibiting employment of such a minor.

As discussed supra § 14, in many jurisdictions statutes have been enacted which forbid the employment of minors under a designated age and make disobedience thereof an offense. Although there is some authority to the contrary,[42] the general rule is that, where a minor hired in violation of a statute of this character is injured in the service, the defense of assumption of risk is not open to the employer.[43] Any other rule, it has been said, would defeat the purpose of the law and render it absolutely futile,[44] and would permit the parties to accomplish by indirection that which is expressly prohibited by statute in furtherance of public policy.[45] The rule is applicable, although the infant or his parent misrepresented the infant's age.[46] The employer must ascertain at his peril that those employed by him may be lawfully employed.[47] A child by his false statement cannot be permitted to repeal a statute.[48]

§ 420. Risks outside Scope of Employment

A master is bound to a higher degree of care in the case of a child in seeing that he does not assume an unusual risk outside the scope of his employment.

The rules under which an adult assumes risks when doing work outside of the scope of the employment, as discussed supra §§ 407–409, have been held not to apply in the same degree to children employees.[49] The master is bound to a higher degree of care in the case of a child than would be required in the case of an adult in seeing that he does not assume an unusual risk not within the scope of his employment.[50] Where the child is directed to do work outside of the scope of his employment and receives no instructions or warning as to the danger of the work, he does not assume the risk of so doing.[51] Nevertheless he may assume the risk of unusual dangers outside of the scope of his employment in disobedience of orders, and, where he is injured before his action could in the exercise of proper care be discovered and prevented, the master is not liable.[52]

G. CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE

1. In General

§ 421. Definition and Nature

Contributory negligence by an employee is his failure to use such precautions for his own safety as ordinary prudence requires.

Contributory negligence of an employee is the omission on his part to use such precautions for his own safety as ordinary prudence requires.[53] It involves some fault or breach of duty on the part of the employee and his failure to use such care for his safety as ordinarily prudent employees in the same circumstances would use.[54] It has been held that to constitute contributory negligence, there must be some failure on the part of the employee, in addition to the ordinary risk imposed by the character of his work, which would amount to culpable negligence,[55] that contributory negligence on the part of an employee must involve some danger that is so glaring as to threaten immediate injury,[56] and that contributory negligence exists only where an employee with full knowledge of an existing danger and with a free choice of avoiding or exposing himself to it deliberately or carelessly exposes himself.[57]

Contributory negligence may take the form of an affirmative act or of a failure to act.[58] It may consist in an act or in a failure to act that creates a new risk or that enhances or assumes an existing one.[59] It is a matter relating solely to torts and is governed by the principles peculiarly applicable to that branch of jurisprudence.[60] As discussed supra § 357, assumption of risk and contributory negligence are not the same, and an employee may be contributorily negligent, even though the cause of the injury was not a risk that he assumed.[61]

§ 422. As a Defense

Contributory negligence ordinarily is a defense to an action by an employee against his employer for injuries arising out of his employment.

Subject to certain common-law exceptions, as discussed infra §§ 423, 424, and except as modified by statute, as discussed infra § 425, as a general rule, contributory negligence on the part of the injured employee is a defense and defeats any recovery by him against the employer for injuries arising out of his employment.[62] It displaces a prima facie liability of the master.[63] It has been held that, when contributory negligence is set up as a defense by the master, by necessary implication it admits negligence on the part of the master,[64] by denying the right of the servant to recover damages for an injury which would not have occurred but for the servant's own negligence contributing thereto.[65]

§ 423. —— Injury Avoidable by Master Notwithstanding Contributory Negligence

Under the last clear chance doctrine, an employee may recover despite his contributory negligence if the employer, after discovering his peril, could have avoided the injury by the use of ordinary care.

The rule that contributory negligence is a defense, as discussed supra § 422, is subject to a limitation or exception variously called the "last clear chance doctrine" or "humanitarian doctrine," the effect of which is to give a right of recovery to the injured servant notwithstanding his contributory negligence, if the master, after discovering his peril, could by the use of ordinary care have avoided injuring him.[66] A master may not refuse to exercise ordinary care to save his servant from a perilous situation.[67] The basis of this doctrine is that, notwithstanding the servant's negligence, the master has the last opportunity of avoiding the injury[68] and that his negligence, and not the contributory negligence of the servant, is the proximate cause of the injury.[69] The servant must show that after knowledge of his peril the master failed to exercise due care to avoid injuring him and that, as a proximate consequence of this negligence, the servant sustained the injuries complained of.[70]

It has been held that the doctrine of the "last clear chance" applies only to a case where the master actually knew of the servant's peril and might have avoided the injury but failed to do so.[71] On the other hand there are decisions which either actually hold or tend to sustain the view that the "last clear chance doctrine" applies not only where the servant's peril was actually discovered, but also where in the exercise of reasonable care it would have been discovered,[72] unless, under the circumstances, the master was not under a duty to keep a lookout.[73]

It has also been held that it is essential to the applicability of the last clear chance doctrine that the peril be inescapable by action on the servant's part or that he be oblivious to it.[74] Where the negligence of the servant is subsequent to, and concurrent with, the negligence of the master in failing to use ordinary care to avoid injuring the servant, there can be no recovery.[75] This principle applies where the servant was negligent up to the very moment when he was hurt.[76]

Exercise of care to prevent injury. There can be no recovery for injuries sustained by the servant where, after discovering his peril, all reasonable means were used to prevent injuring him[77] or where every precaution was taken to avoid injuring him.[78] Also, there can be no recovery where, after discovery of the perilous situation of the servant, it is impossible to avoid the injury to him by the exercise of ordinary care.[79]

Reason to believe that servant would avoid injury. If the master at the time of the injury had valid grounds to believe that the servant himself would take care to protect himself and avoid injury, the master cannot be held liable under the last clear chance doctrine.[80]

Effect of statutory provisions. The right of the servant to recover under the last clear chance doctrine is not affected by the Federal Employers' Liability Act,[81] providing that contributory negligence shall not bar a recovery but that damages shall be diminished in proportion to his negligence,[82] or by state statutes containing similar provisions,[83] or by a state statute authorizing recovery for injuries to railroad employees while "in the exercise of due care and diligence."[84]

§ 424. —— Willful or Wanton Negligence of Master

Where the injury results from the willful or wanton negligence of the employer or one for whose conduct he is responsible, contributory negligence on the part of the servant will constitute no defense to an action for injuries sustained.

Where the injury resulted from the willful or wanton negligence of the employer or one for whose conduct he is responsible, contributory negligence on the part of the servant will constitute no defense to an action for injuries sustained.[85] In order to constitute willful negligence the act which produced it must have been intentional, or must have been done under such circumstances as evidenced a reckless disregard for the safety of others and a willingness to inflict the injury complained of.[86] When the danger is very great, and the care to prevent disaster is very slight or there is no care at all, the neglect of the party becomes a willful act in law.[87] A mere failure to use ordinary care gives no right of action since this does not involve the element of willfulness.[88] The willfulness must be the proximate cause of the injury.[89]

§ 425. —— Affected by Special Statutory Provisions

a. In general
b. Comparative negligence statutes

a. In General

With respect to an employer's liability for injuries to employees, statutes modifying the doctrine that contributory negligence is a defense apply only under the circumstances and to the extent prescribed.

Under statutes enacted in the various jurisdictions with respect to an employer's liability for injuries to its employees, it is generally held that the defense of contributory negligence is not affected by the statute unless it is so provided expressly or by necessary implication,[90] and then only under the circumstances and to the extent prescribed by the statute.[91] Thus, it has been held that the defense of contributory negligence is not affected by statutes abrogating the defense of assumption of risk[92] or the fellow-servant doctrine,[93] or by a statute rendering the master liable for injuries to his servant caused by defects in the construction of ways, works, and machinery.[94] It has also been held that a statutory provision that knowledge by an employee of defective or unsafe machinery, ways, appliances, or structures shall be no defense to an action for an injury caused thereby does not destroy the defense of contributory negligence.[95]

Under a compensation type statute providing that an employee may recover in an action at law, even though the employer is not negligent, it has been held that contributory negligence is not a defense,[96] but recovery is defeated where the injury was due solely to the employee's negligence,[97] although to come within this exception the employee's negligence must consist of an affirmative act and not a mere failure to act.[98] Workmen's compensation statutes, as affecting the defense of contributory negligence in common-law actions, are discussed in the C.J.S. title Workmen's Compensation Acts § 940, also 71 C.J. p 1491 note 36–p 1495 note 60.

Statutes abrogating defense. Under some statutes, the defense of contributory negligence has been abolished in actions by employees for injuries suffered as a result of their employer's negligence;[99] and, where the legislative body has sought to eliminate the doctrine that an employee may be completely barred by his own negligence from recovery for an injury caused by his employer's negligence, the doctrine must not be allowed recrudescence under some other label in the common-law lexicon.[1] However, even where contributory negligence is out of the case by reason of a statutory provision, the fact that the employee's own act was the sole proximate cause of the injury may constitute a good defense since it negatives the complaint that the injury was caused by the employer's negligence.[2]

Statutory requirements for safety of servants. Contributory negligence is not a defense if the employee's injury resulted from the employer's failure to comply with a statute requiring it to take certain precautions for the safety of employees where the statute expressly or by necessary implication excludes the defense of contributory negligence,[3] but statutes excluding the defense of contributory negligence in case of breach by the master of some statutory duty imposed on him for the benefit of the servant have no application except in cases where the breach of the statute contributes to the injury.[4] By the express provisions of statutes, contributory negligence is held not a defense where the master has violated so-called safety appliance statutes[5] or statutes for the protection of miners,[6] or factory operatives,[7] or for the protection of railroad employees working on or about the track.[8]

pressly or by necessary implication abrogates the defense of contributory negligence, an employer, whose failure to comply with a statute requiring him to take designated precautions for the safety and protection of its employees causes injury to its employee, is not deprived of the defense of contributory negligence.[9] This principle has been applied in cases where the master failed to comply with statutes requiring dangerous machinery to be guarded,[10] requiring elevator wells to be guarded,[11] requiring mines to be kept free from gas,[12] requiring precautions to be taken to prevent coal from falling,[13] requiring frogs to be blocked,[14] or prohibiting the master from furnishing unsafe ladders or scaffolding.[15] On the other hand, there is some authority that, where the employer violates a statute for the safety and protection of employees, contributory negligence is not a defense,[16] at least where the purpose of the statute was to protect employees from the consequences of their own negligence.[17] Moreover, it has been broadly stated that, where the employee is seeking recovery not on the basis of the employer's negligence, but because of the employer's breach of a statutory duty, to the injury of the employee, the employee's contributory negligence does not constitute a defense,[18] although, where the statute is merely declaratory of the common law, it does not create a statutory cause of action, but merely gives statutory recognition to a common-law cause of action, and contributory negligence is a defense.[19]

Under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, the carrier is deprived of the defense of contributory negligence where the injury resulted from the failure to comply with a statute enacted for the safety and protection of railroad employees,[20] such as the Federal Safety Appliance Act,[21] the Federal Boiler

Only where safety statute is involved

Defense of contributory negligence is eliminated in action under Federal Employers' Liability Act only where statute for safety of employees is violated.—Nashville, C. & St. L. Ry. v. Hines, 94 S.W.2d 397, 20 Tenn. App. 1.

Inspector Act,[22] or the Hours of Service Act.[23] Under such statutes, the employer is liable regardless of contributory negligence,[24] which must be excluded from consideration;[25] the contributory negligence of the servant is not only not a defense, but does not go in reduction of damages,[26] but recovery may not be had where the employee's negligence was the sole cause of his injury.[27] Since the scope of the Federal Safety Appliance Act is wider than that of the Federal Employers' Liability Act, the case may be covered by the former, but not by the latter, as where a train is engaged in intra-state commerce, and in such case contributory negligence may be a defense.[28]

b. Comparative Negligence Statutes

Under statutes which prescribe a rule of comparative negligence it has generally been held that the employee's contributory negligence is not a defense in the sense that it will defeat recovery.

Under statutes which prescribe a rule of comparative negligence, as discussed in detail in the C.J.S. title Negligence §§ 169–173, also 39 C.J. p 822 note 80–p 824 note 39, and 45 C.J. p 1038 note 16 et seq, it has generally been held that the employee's contributory negligence is not a defense in the sense that it will defeat recovery[29] unless, under some

Employee's negligence, however late and however directly connected with injury, does not defeat cause of action if employer's negligence remains a proximate contributing cause.—Mooney v. Terminal R. Ass'n of St. Louis, 176 S.W.2d 605, 352 Mo. 245.

Negligence of fellow servant

(1) Fact that employee's negligence was contributing cause co-operating with negligence of other employees in causing injury is not complete defense to railway company sued by employee.—Hawthorne v. International-Great Northern R. Co., Tex.Civ.App., 63 S.W.2d 243, error refused.

New and superseding cause of injury

Contributory negligence of employee seeking recovery under act does not preclude recovery in action based on violation of employer's statutory duty, unless contributory negligence can be deemed new and superseding cause of accident, and it is not considered as such when it is a normal reaction to situation created by employer's wrong.—Anderson v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., C.C.A.N.Y., 89 F.2d 629, certiorari denied Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Anderson, 58 S.Ct. 14, 302 U.S. 696, 82 L.Ed. 538.

(3) Railroad switchman was held as matter of law guilty of contributory negligence constituting sole proximate cause of death where he violated rule and custom by going between cars to couple air hose before engine was coupled to cars.—Southern Ry. Co. v. Glenn, 154 So. 792, 228 Ala. 563.

(4) Engineer's disobedience of train dispatcher's order to run locomotive on pass track at certain station and wait until freight train passed on main track was held sole cause of his death in collision with such train, beyond such station.—Southern Ry. § 426. —— What Law Governs

The law of the place where the injury was inflicted governs as to contributory negligence in an action by an employee for injuries arising out of his employment.

The law of the place where the injury is inflicted governs as to the defense of contributory negligence, although the suit is brought in another jurisdiction.[35] Statutes in force at the time of the injury complained of control the defense of contributory negligence.[36] Where the suit is based on the Federal Employers' Liability Act, the effect of contributory negligence when established is controlled by that statute,[37] the state law having no application;[38] but since the Federal Employers' Liability Act does not define contributory negligence and since there is no federal common law on this subject, the question as to the existence of contributory negligence is to be determined by the state law.[39]

§ 427. What Constitutes Contributory Negligence in General

An employee is bound to exercise reasonable and ordinary care for his own protection, and, in determining whether he has exercised such care, all the attendant circumstances must be taken into consideration.

An employee is bound to exercise ordinary and reasonable care for his own protection.[40] Furthermore, it has been held that the duty of the employee to use this degree of care is a continuing one,[41] and is not affected by the fact that the master may by his own negligence have exposed the servant to danger.[42] However gross the negligence of the master, the servant on discovering the danger must exercise ordinary care to avoid injury.[43] The law does not exact of the servant extraordinary care,[44] or the highest degree of care.[45] Ordinary and reasonable care is the measure of care required of the servant; nothing beyond this is required.[46] This is so notwithstanding a rule of the master imposing a higher degree of care; the courts will follow the law and not the rule.[47]

What is reasonable or ordinary care. The reasonable or ordinary care required of the servant is such care as would be used by persons of ordinary prudence under like circumstances,[48] and, in determining whether the servant has exercised reasonable or ordinary care in any given case, all the attendant circumstances must be taken into consideration,[49] such as the physical surroundings or environment in which the servant is placed,[50] the age, jured foreman in failing to remove gauge in time was secondary.—Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Jeffcoat, 107 So. 456, 214 Ala. 317, certiorari denied 46 S.Ct. 639, 271 U.S. 688, 70 L.Ed. 1152.

§ 428. —— Reliance on Care of Master in General

A servant has the right to rely on the performance by the master of the duties imposed on the master for the protection of the servant.

A servant has the right to rely on the performance by the master or his authorized agents of the duties imposed on the master for the protection of his servants, to furnish suitable tools, appliances, reasonably safe places for work, etc., to inspect them from time to time, to see that they are in a reasonably safe condition, and to maintain them in that condition,[59] unless the servant has knowledge to the contrary,[60] or unless the danger is obvious and imminent.[61] The fact that the place of work is one of unusual danger does not affect the operation of the rule, and the servant is entitled to assume that it is as safe as ordinary care and diligence can make it.[62]

The employee has the right to believe that the employer will not unnecessarily jeopardize his person by avoidable risk,[63] or expose him to any hidden peril of which he had not been warned;[64] that reasonably safe methods of work will be followed;[65] and that rules for the safety and protection of the servant will be complied with and that nothing will be done in violation of these rules that will place the servant in peril.[66] Moreover, an employee has the right to assume that the employer will exercise ordinary care to prevent anything being done which will increase the dangers incident to his employment,[67] and he is not under a duty to exercise care to discover dangers arising through the negligence of his employer.[68]

An employee may assume that the employer will discharge its duty of warning him of known dangers;[69] that warning will be given when a perilous situation arises, where the right to such warning is established by custom;[70] that the methods of work will not be changed while he is at work without notice or warning to him;[71] and that dangerous conditions or work will not be created without due warning being given.[72] Also, where a servant is required to give his attention to the work in hand, while working in a dangerous place, he is entitled to rely on the fact that the master, knowing such to be the fact, will exercise due care and diligence to protect him from danger not directly arising from such work;[73] but he cannot, in the performance of a hazardous service, negligently omit to adopt the usual and proper precautions which have been previously required by the master, and which his own experience in the service has shown to be useful as tending to diminish the risks of the service, in a supposed reliance on the prudence and judgment of his master, whose suggestions and directions he willfully disregards.[74]

Reliance on master's superior knowledge and ability. Within reasonable limits,[75] the servant is entitled to rely on the superior knowledge, ability, and skill of the master or his representative,[76] and is not bound at his peril to set his own judgment above that of his superior.[77]

§ 429. —— Assurances or Representations as to Safety

39 C.J. p 829 note 50.

A servant is not guilty of contributory negligence where he relies on the assurances or representations of the master or his vice principal as to the safety of the place of work, tools, machinery, or appliances,[78] or on his promise to protect and guard the servant from danger,[79] or to warn him of peril,[80] unless the danger is so obvious and imminent that no ordinarily prudent person would undertake to perform the service.[81] The general rule applies even though the servant might have some misgiving as to the safety of the place,[82] since ordinarily he is entitled to rely on the master's knowledge and judgment.[83]

Assurances of safety by the master or his vice principal are important only in so far as they induce the employee to act in reasonable reliance on the assurances rather than in reliance on his own judgment,[84] and assurances are of no effect for the purpose of relieving the servant of the imputation of negligence where, as a matter of fact, he placed no reliance on them.[85] Where the dangers to be anticipated are as obvious to the servant as to the master,[86] or where the servant has better knowledge than his master,[87] he may not rely on assurances as to the absence of danger. In any event, assurances of safety by the master will not relieve the servant from exercising due care to avoid injury from defects in his place of work.[88]

What constitutes assurance of safety. With respect to the character of the assurance, it is not necessary that the master should use words which in terms expressly and directly assure the servant that the place where he is working is reasonably safe.[89] It is sufficient that the acts of the master, under all the circumstances, amount to an assurance that the place where he directs the servant to work is reasonably safe.[90] Where the work is done in the presence, and under the immediate direction, of the master or his representative, this is equivalent to an assurance that the servant may safely proceed with the work.[91] Orders to do the work,[92] especially to do a rush job with knowledge that the servant had no time or means for inspection,[93] are equivalent to an assurance of safety.

§ 430. —— Reliance on Care of Fellow Servants

An employee has the right to assume that other employees will perform their duties and will exercise due care.

Continuous use of defective tool

Where danger from continued use of defective tool is so obvious that ordinarily prudent person would not continue to use tool, servant cannot hold master liable for injuries resulting from use of tool, notwithstanding he may have received assurances of safety from master, since servant's use of obviously dangerous tool constituted contributory negligence.—Atlanta, B. & C. An employee has the right to rely on the employer to exercise due care to furnish him competent employees with whom to work[94] and, subject to limitations which may be imposed by the fellow-servant doctrine discussed supra § 321 et seq, an employee has the right to assume that other employees of his employer will perform their duties,[95] observe the rules and instructions,[96] and exercise reasonable care.[97] An employee is not required to exercise care to discover a danger created by the negligence of other employees[98] or to assume that his fellow employees will disregard their duty to give a warning signal.[99] However, this does not absolve him from caring for his own safety, as an ordinarily prudent man would do under like circumstances,[1] and he cannot recover for an injury received by reason of the negligence of a fellow servant, if he knew or, by the exercise of ordinary care, might have known thereof.[2]

§ 431. —— Knowledge of Defects or Dangers in General

An employee is guilty of contributory negligence where he fails to exercise due care to avoid a danger of which he has knowledge.

Where a servant has actual or constructive knowledge of defects and dangers of such a character that a reasonably prudent man, under similar circumstances, would exercise due care to avoid the dangers, and is injured by reason of his failure to use ordinary care, he is guilty of contributory negligence.[3] The fact that the unknown negligence of

Assumption of risk

(1) Assumption of risk by employee does not amount to contributory negligence precluding recovery unless danger is so obvious that no ordinarily prudent man would risk it.—Maulden v. High Point Bending & Chair Co., 144 S.E. 557, 196 N.C. 122.

(2) Assumption of risk generally see supra § 357 et seq.

Operation of natural forces

Where dangerous condition arises in course of work and occurs as result of well-known operations of natural forces, it is considered an open and obvious danger placing on servant duty of taking proper precautions for his own safety.—Cummins v. Dufault, 139 P.2d 308, 18 Wash.2d 274.

Estoppel to deny knowledge

An employee who has complained to the employer is precluded from claiming that he did not know of the danger.—Shoemaker v. Electric Auto-Lite Co., 41 N.E.2d 433, 68 Ohio App. 169.

Knowledge of fellow servant's incompetence

(1) Mere knowledge by employee of fellow servant's incompetency will not necessarily defeat right to recover for injuries sustained by reason thereof.—Reed v. Koch, 282 S. W. 515, 220 Mo.App. 175.

(2) Contributory negligence of employee continuing to work with intoxicated fellow servant is judged according to danger he should rea-

the master made the danger greater than the servant supposed it to be has been held not to authorize a recovery.[4] However, it is only when a servant has actual or constructive knowledge of defects or dangers that a recovery is precluded.[5]

If a servant had no actual knowledge of the danger which threatened him, and, in the exercise of ordinary care, would not have apprehended the danger in time to avoid it, he is not guilty of contributory negligence and can recover.[6] In order to charge an injured employee with contributory negligence, it must first be shown that he should reasonably have apprehended the danger which threatened him.[7] The knowledge of a fellow servant, who had charge of the work in hand, that a certain tool was defective, will not prevent a recovery from the master for an injury to a servant caused thereby, since contributory negligence, to defeat a cause of action, must be that of the party injured.[8]

Statutory modifications of rule. Under some statutes the fact that the danger which caused the injury was known or apparent to the injured employee does not render him guilty of contributory negligence where the hazard was created by the employer's noncompliance with a statute.[9]

§ 432. —— Extent of Knowledge

A servant is not chargeable with contributory negligence in failing to take due care to avoid a danger, where he knows of the defect but does not appreciate the danger.

There is a distinction between knowledge of defects and knowledge of the risks resulting from such defects, and a servant is not chargeable with contributory negligence in failure to take due care to avoid a danger if he knows that defects exist but does not know, or cannot know by the exercise of ordinary care, that there is danger,[10] or, knowing that there is danger, does not fully appreciate the risk of the dangerous situation in which he is placed in carrying on the work;[11] and it has been held that even the fact that a servant has performed work, knowing it to be dangerous, does not of itself make him guilty of contributory negligence, but it must appear that he did that which was dangerous in a negligent manner.[12] On the other hand, a servant's knowledge of danger need not amount to full information or to absolute certainty.[13] So if the servant knows that the danger is great, he cannot escape the charge of contributory negligence because the negligence of the master made the danger greater than he supposed it to be;[14] and a servant who has been advised of a certain danger, and how to avoid it, is not excused for exposing himself to it by the fact that he does not realize the magnitude of the possible injuries.[15]

§ 433. —— Constructive Knowledge

An employee is charged with contributory negligence where he fails to take due care to avoid obvious dangers.

An employee is chargeable with contributory negligence where he fails to take due care to avoid defects and dangers which are so open and obvious that anyone in the exercise of ordinary care and prudence would discover them.[16] The fact that the servant does not possess ordinary intelligence does not affect the operation of the rule unless the master knows or is chargeable with knowledge of such fact.[17] Nevertheless, in order to charge a servant with notice of defects and dangers, they must be so plain and clear that if he does not see them he is necessarily negligent.[18] Mere opportunity for knowledge is not the equivalent of imputed knowledge;[19] it is only when men of ordinary prudence and observation would have observed the danger under like circumstances that the servant is chargeable with negligence.[20] It is only ignorant negligence that can be chargeable as the equivalent of knowledge.[21]

§ 434. —— Continuing Work with Knowledge of Danger

A servant is chargeable with contributory negligence where he continues work with knowledge of dangers to which an ordinarily prudent person would not subject himself.

In the absence of any statutory regulation of the subject,[22] where a servant continues work with knowledge, actual or constructive, of dangers which an ordinarily prudent man would refuse to subject himself to, he is guilty of contributory negligence,[23] particularly where he has created the danger.[24]

On the other hand, the mere fact that the servant performs the work knowing that it is dangerous does not render him guilty of contributory negligence without regard to the degree of danger and risk involved;[25] and a servant is not guilty of contributory negligence in continuing work after knowledge of the defects and dangers incident to the work unless the danger is so obvious and imminent as to threaten immediate injury[26] so that a reasonably prudent man would abandon the work,[27] or unless the danger is so obvious that the chances of injury are greater than those of safety,[28] or so obvious that the servant may not hope to escape by the exercise of reasonable care;[29] nor is he guilty of contributory negligence in continuing the work where it may reasonably be supposed that the instrumentalities furnished, although dangerous, may be safely used in the exercise of great care and skill.[30] It has been held that these rules apply although there are other places where the servant might have worked.[31]

Notice or complaint to master. The fact that the servant complains to the master will not exonerate him of contributory negligence[32] unless he has reason to expect that, in consequence of his notification to the master, the defect will be repaired before he will be subjected to danger from it.[33] It has been held that the mere continued use of a defective appliance after complaint is not necessarily contributory negligence, where the servant is injured in the hurry of business while in the discharge of his duty,[34] or where the risk was not so obvious that a reasonably prudent man would not have assumed it.[35] Where a servant is injured owing to the failure of the master to enforce a certain rule, there is no contributory negligence on the part of the servant in continuing in the service after the master was notified of the violation of the rule and had ordered its enforcement.[36]

Promise to remedy defect. Where a servant notifies his master of defects in the tools, machinery, appliances, or ways and places for work, and the master promises to remove them, it has been held that the servant is not guilty of contributory negligence by continuing at work for a reasonable time,[37] and the master is not relieved from liability for injuries from the defect unless the employee failed to use ordinary care.[38] On the other hand, notwithstanding a promise of the master to repair within a reasonable time, the servant will be held guilty of contributory negligence where a continuance in the employment to his knowledge exposes him to extraordinary danger,[39] or threatens immediate injury,[40] or where the danger is so obvious and imminent that no person of ordinary prudence would expose himself to it.[41] A servant is not required to make special investigation or inquiry as to whether or not the master had kept his promise after the time for its performance has passed,[42] but he may not rely on the promise where he continues work after a reasonable time with knowledge that the promise has not been performed.[43]

Where a servant calls attention to defects in an appliance and the employer repairs it in such a manner that the defects are hidden, but not cured, the employee is not guilty of contributory negligence in using it after it has been so repaired.[44] In any event a promise on the part of an employer to remedy a dangerous condition of which the employee has complained does not excuse the employee from exercising due care to prevent injury to himself pending repairs,[45] that is to say, care commensurate with the danger;[46] and if the servant, notwithstanding the defect, could have performed the work with comparative safety he cannot recover for injuries sustained by doing the work by a hazardous method.[47]

§ 435. —— Comparative Knowledge of Master and Servant

A servant injured because of a danger as open and obvious to him as to the master is chargeable with such negligence as will bar a recovery by him.

Where a danger is as open and obvious to the servant as to the master,[48] or where the servant has better means of knowledge than the master,[49] he will be charged with such negligence as to bar a recovery. So too where it does not appear that the master knew or with ordinary care ought to have known of the defect which caused the injury, and it does appear that the servant had equal means with the master of ascertaining its existence, the servant cannot recover.[50] It has been said by way of limitation of this rule that if it may be construed to shift ascertainment of hidden dangers from the master to the servant it cannot be indorsed.[51]

§ 436. —— Mistake of Judgment, Temporary Forgetfulness, or Accident

As a general rule an employee injured by reason of a momentary forgetfulness of a known danger may not recover.

A mere mistake of judgment on the part of a servant does not necessarily constitute contributory negligence; it depends on the facts of the particular case.[52] So it has been held that a servant is not guilty of contributory negligence merely because he chanced to slip and came in contact with machinery which the master had failed to guard as required by statute.[53]

Forgetfulness of danger. As a general rule, one who sustains injuries by reason of momentary forgetfulness of a danger of which he has knowledge or of which he should have known in the exercise of ordinary care is not entitled to recover[54] in the absence of any circumstances producing hurry, excitement, or confusion;[55] and this is so although he called attention to the defects out of which the danger arose and although promises had been made by one in authority to remedy them.[56]

Nevertheless the rule must have a reasonable construction.[57] Momentary forgetfulness may in an emergency excuse negligence on the part of a servant.[58] To forget is not negligence unless it shows a want of reasonable care,[59] and circumstances may exist under which failure to remember a source of peril is excused and does not constitute negligence.[60] Such is the case where the servant is called on to execute in haste an order of the master requiring prompt attention,[61] where conditions arise suddenly in the discharge of his duties which are calculated to throw him off his guard and which momentarily, without fault on his part, divert his attention from the danger,[62] or where at the time the injuries were sustained his services required his full attention.[63] It has been held that, where the employer, without reason or necessity, subjects the servant to a danger which could have been easily guarded against, he has no right to expect a never-failing or superhuman watchfulness on the part of his servant to escape that danger.[64]

§ 437. —— Suggestions or Remonstrances by Servant

Failure to complain to the employer of the existence of a danger may constitute contributory negligence.

Failure to complain to the employer of the existence of a danger may under some circumstances constitute contributory negligence,[65] but it has been held that negligence cannot be imputed to a servant for failing to remonstrate with another servant over whom he has no control, and who represents the master with respect to the work in the performance of which the injury is sustained.[66] Where a servant participates in a dangerous course of action either by advising or instigating it, or by neglecting to expostulate, and is in a position to obviate the danger, he cannot recover;[67] and even

Drunken driving

Where salesman, while being driven by his superior with other employees to employer's zone meeting, participated in drinking with others, knew that his superior was drunk and driving carelessly, and made no protest against such driving, but acquiesced therein, salesman was guilty of negligence, precluding recovery against employer for injuries sustained from collision with tree. —Sparks v. where the injury results from the action of a superior officer the servant cannot recover if such action was induced by negligent statements on his part.[68] So too, where a servant fails to obey an order of his superior as first given and acquiesces in the adoption of a different course of action suggested by his fellow servants, and consented to by such superior, and by reason of which the injury is sustained, he is guilty of contributory negligence barring recovery.[69]

§ 438. —— Disease or Other Physical Condition

Where an injury results directly from a disease or defective physical condition it has been held that an employee may not recover for the injury.

Where a servant whose duty requires him to be in a position of danger becomes sick and unconscious, and is unable to get away, and injury results to him from such condition, he is not guilty of contributory negligence;[70] but if the injury results directly from a disease or defective physical condition it has been held that he may not recover for the injury.[71] If an employee negligently falls asleep in a dangerous position,[72] or becomes sick or unconscious while wrongfully in a position of danger,[73] and injury results he cannot recover unless the circumstances are such that the doctrine of "last clear chance," discussed supra § 423, applies. The voluntary intoxication of a servant at the time of a personal injury may be considered in determining whether he took reasonable care for his safety.[74]

§ 439. Scope of Employment

The doctrine of contributory negligence has been invoked to bar recovery where a servant sustains injuries while attempting without authority to do something not within the scope of his employment.

The doctrine of contributory negligence has been invoked to bar recovery where a servant sustains injuries while attempting without authority to do something not within the scope of his employment[75] unless there is a pressing emergency on him to do that work.[76] This rule applies although the servant is acting under the orders of another servant[77] unless the latter occupies the place of vice principal;[78] and the application of the rule is not affected by a statute which abolishes the defense of contributory negligence where the master has failed to comply with a statutory requirement for the protection of the servant.[79] So there can be no recovery where the injury is sustained while the employee is voluntarily and unnecessarily absent from his post of duty,[80] or where, not in the performance of his duty, he places himself in a perilous position and neglects to exercise ordinary care for his own safety.[81]

Where a servant is actually performing work which he has been hired to do, he cannot be said to be acting outside of the scope of his employment merely because in performing the particular act he was not acting under express directions of the master;[82] and, where a servant is directed by his master to help another servant in work which he designates, it cannot be said that he is a volunteer merely because he continues to do the work in the absence of the other servant.[83]

§ 440. Proximate Cause of Injury

An employee's contributory negligence is not a defense to an action for injuries sustained unless it was a proximate cause of the injury.

83. N.Y.—Fitzhenry v. Lamson, 45 N.Y.S. 875, 19 App.Div. 54.

In order for negligence of the servant to constitute a defense to an action for injuries sustained, it must have been the proximate cause of the injury, that is, it must have contributed to the injury in such a way that, if the servant had not been negligent, no injury would have resulted from the negligence of the master.[84] If the servant's negligence was only a condition on which the negligence of his superior operated as the proximate cause of the accident he may nevertheless recover.[85] Thus an employee's absence from his post will bar his recovery for injuries only if it was the proximate cause of the injuries.[86] On the other hand, if the servant's own negligence was the proximate cause of the injury, there can be no recovery,[87] and it is not essential that the negligence of the servant should be the sole proximate cause of the injury.[88]

Drunkenness in itself will not bar recovery unless it is shown that such condition caused the accident[89] or in a measure contributed to it.[90]

§ 441. —— Use of Defective Appliances

An employee may not recover for injuries where his contributory negligence in using defective appliances was the proximate cause of the injury.

Where the employee's contributory negligence in using defective appliances is the proximate cause of the injury he may not recover.[91] Thus recovery is barred where the proximate cause of the injury was the employee's negligent failure to inspect,[92] but where the inspection negligently omitted would not have revealed the defect it has been held not the proximate cause of the injury.[93] It has been held that where the servant, on the exigency of the oc-

§ 442. —— Precautions against Known Dangers

An employee's contributory negligence in failing to take precautions against known dangers bars recovery for injury only if it was the proximate cause of the injury.

An employee's contributory negligence in failing to take precautions against known dangers bars recovery for injury if his failure to do so is the proximate cause of injuries sustained by him.[95] The rule is otherwise, however, where it is not the proximate cause of the injury.[96]

§ 443. —— Adopting Dangerous Methods of Work

An employee's contributory negligence in adopting dangerous methods of work bars recovery where it is the proximate cause of the injury, but not otherwise.

An employee's contributory negligence in adopting a dangerous method of work bars recovery where such negligence was the proximate cause of the injury,[97] but not otherwise.[98]

proximate cause of the injury.[1] It is not sufficient to bar a recovery that the disobedience was a mere condition of the injury.[2] Contributory negligence in failing to heed warnings or signals may bar recovery where it is the proximate cause of the injury.[3] An employee's failure to perform his duties bars recovery where, but only where, it is the proximate cause of the injury.[4]

Violation of statute. An employee's violation of a statute, where it constitutes contributory negligence, will bar a recovery for injuries of which such violation was the proximate cause.[5] On the other hand, a recovery is permissible if the violation of the statute was not the proximate cause of the injury.[6]

§ 445. —— Unnecessary Occupation of Dangerous Position

Where an employee unnecessarily places himself in a position of danger, such act bars recovery if it is the proximate cause of his injury.

Where a servant unnecessarily puts himself into a dangerous position where there are other positions which he might take in the performance of his duties, and his doing so is the proximate cause of the injury complained of, there can be no recovery.[7]

2. PARTICULAR APPLICATIONS OF DOCTRINE

§ 446. Tools, Machinery, Appliances, and Places

- a. Duty to use appliances furnished
- b. Duty to obtain appliances
- c. Choice of appliances or materials
- d. Unauthorized or improper use of machinery or appliances
- e. Choice of places for work
- f. Choice of ways of passage
- g. Unnecessary occupation of dangerous position

a. Duty to Use Appliances Furnished

A servant having actual or constructive knowledge that appliances have been furnished for his use, in the course of his work, is under a duty to use them; and if he is injured by reason of his failure to do so he is chargeable with contributory negligence.

In accordance with the general rules of contributory negligence, as well as their limitations and qualifications, discussed supra §§ 421–445, which operate as to the negligence of servants in respect of tools, machinery, appliances, and places of work, if a servant knows or is charged with knowledge of the fact that proper appliances have been fur-

Normal response to emergency

Whether conduct of freight conductor in rushing into zone of danger instead of remaining in position of safety constituted such a new, independent, and intervening cause as to supersede antecedent negligence of railroad as proximate cause of conductor's death depended on whether conductor's conduct was a normal response to the stimulus of a dangerous situation created by prior negligent conduct of the railroad.—Central Wisconsin Trust Co. v. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co., 287 N.W. 699, 232 Wis. 536.

nished for his use by his employer[8] it is the duty of the servant to use such appliances for the prosecution of his work; and if he is injured by reason of his failure to use them he is chargeable with contributory negligence precluding a recovery.[9] This rule applies although the use of the appliances furnished may be inconvenient[10] and although the servant is afraid he may not be able to get out enough work to satisfy the master if he uses the appliances.[11] It has been held that, where appliances for doing certain work can be picked up at any time around the place of work, the failure of the master to furnish them specially does not render him liable for an injury to a servant caused by his not using them.[12] However, a failure to use the appliances furnished is not contributory negligence where, under the circumstances, the servant is excused from using them,[13] as where he has knowledge of defects in the appliances;[14] and under some statutes the servant is not precluded from recovering because of his failure to use particular appliances if the master was negligent in failing to provide other safeguards and such negligence contributed to the injury.[15]

b. Duty to Obtain Appliances

A servant who knows, or is charged with knowledge, of defects or dangers is guilty of contributory negligence if he fails to demand or obtain appliances by which the danger might be avoided.

Where a servant knows, or is charged with knowledge, of defects or dangers, and is injured by reason of his failure to demand or obtain appliances by which the danger might have been avoided, he is guilty of such contributory negligence as to bar a recovery.[16] A failure, however, to use a particular appliance is not such contributory negligence where the threatened danger is not of a character that calls for the use of such appliance;[17] and where the servant is injured, while using an appliance furnished for that purpose, by reason of defects in the appliance his failure to obtain an appliance of other dimensions will not be held contributory negligence in the absence of proof that it could have been used.[18]

c. Choice of Appliances or Materials

If proper appliances or materials are furnished or may be procured by a servant, he may be guilty of contributory negligence in selecting and using an improper, defective, or dangerous appliance or improper materials.

Where proper appliances or materials are furnished or may be procured by a servant and he selects for use an improper, defective, or dangerous appliance or improper materials, in so doing he is not in the exercise of reasonable care and he cannot recover for injuries resulting therefrom,[19] as where he does not use ordinary judgment in selecting materials which prove to be inefficient.[20] He has, however, the right to use such of the appliances furnished as appear to him to be reasonably safe for the performance of his task,[21] or such appliances as a man of ordinary prudence would, under all the circumstances use,[22] and it has been held that, although the appliances or tools selected are insufficient or defective, the servant is not contributorily negligent if he selects the best appliances or tools which are available.[23] Moreover, if the master has furnished for use, or acquiesced in the use of, a particular appliance he cannot afterward contend that it was an improper or inefficient appliance.[24] If a servant is not chargeable with knowledge of the danger, he is not negligent in selecting a defective tool.[25]

Shoring material

Laborer, controlling sewer excavation and killed by cave-in, had duty

d. Unauthorized or Improper Use of Machinery or Appliances

A servant who sustains injuries by reason of his unauthorized or improper use of appliances or machinery furnished for the work ordinarily cannot recover because of contributory negligence.

Ordinarily a servant who sustains injuries by reason of his unauthorized or improper use of machinery or appliances furnished for the work, cannot recover;[26] and this rule is applicable although the machinery or appliances were defective.[27] Where an appliance is used for a purpose for which it was not intended, there can be no recovery unless it was so used with the acquiescence, or at least with the knowledge, of the employer;[28] and, even if used with the acquiescence of the employer, there can be no recovery for injuries sustained in so doing if the danger was obvious and imminent.[29] Where, however, the act is done under the immediate direction of the master or his representative, the servant may recover notwithstanding the appliances were used in a manner different from that for which they were intended.[30]

e. Choice of Places for Work

The voluntary use of an unsafe place to work, when other and safer places are available, constitutes contributory negligence, precluding a recovery for injury, if the danger is obvious or of such a character that an ordinarily prudent person would not incur it under the circumstances.

Where a servant unnecessarily and of his own volition uses an unsafe place to do his work, when other and safer places are available, he cannot recover for injuries sustained by reason of his negligent action, if the danger is obvious or of such character that an ordinarily prudent person would not incur it under like circumstances,[31] especially where the servant at the time of the injury is acting in disobedience of orders.[32] It is the duty of the servant to select the safer of two places for work.[33] However, in order to bar a recovery, it is essential that the place chosen should be so dangerous that an ordinarily prudent person would not choose it,[34] and if the place is safe when he begins work, and it subsequently becomes unsafe because of a changed condition, without any fault or knowledge on his part, he is not contributorily negligent.[35] If the servant at the time of the injury is at his regular place of work and where his ordinary duty requires him to be, he is not guilty of contributory negligence in failing to avail himself of permission to occupy a different and perhaps safer place;[36] and a servant is not necessarily negligent in occupying a position in doing the work at which he is injured where his superior takes the same position in doing the same work and the taking of any other position for doing the work is very difficult.[37]

Near blasting

An employee who is not in charge of blasting, and who does not know of the danger of unexploded charges,

f. Choice of Ways of Passage

The voluntary selection of an unsafe way of passage, when a safe or reasonably safe way is available, may constitute such contributory negligence as will bar a recovery for injuries sustained by a servant.

Where a servant has his choice of two ways of passage, one of which is safe or reasonably safe and the other of which is apparently or obviously dangerous, his voluntary selection of the latter constitutes such contributory negligence as will bar a recovery for injuries sustained,[38] and it has been held that this is so although he was so engrossed in his duty at the time of the accident that he did not realize the danger[39] or was ignorant of, or indifferent to, the danger,[40] or although the way was used by others with the master's knowledge[41] or consent.[42]

On the other hand, a servant is not guilty of contributory negligence in choosing the way which is apparently safe[43] or in accidentally choosing the dangerous way without his own fault;[44] and it has been held that he is not guilty of contributory negligence in using a way kept open as a common passage or thoroughfare by the master[45] or where there is only one way available to him.[46] Where there are different ways over which a servant can pass in the performance of his duties, and all of them are apparently equally safe, the act of choosing one in preference to the others will not preclude a recovery for injuries sustained while passing over it.[47]

g. Unnecessary Occupation of Dangerous Position

(1) In general
(2) Riding in dangerous position

(1) In General

A servant who voluntarily and unnecessarily puts himself into a dangerous position, when reasonably safe positions are available to him, is guilty of such contributory negligence as will preclude a recovery for injury.

If a servant voluntarily and unnecessarily puts himself into a dangerous position, when there are other positions which he may take, in connection is not negligent in working near a place where a blast had been set off without ascertaining whether any charge had failed to explode.—Cogliano v. Ferguson, 117 N.E. 45, 228 Mass. 147.

with the discharge of his duties, which are safe, or reasonably so, he cannot recover damages for an injury contributed to by his negligence in so doing.[48] His act is not justified or excused by the fact that it was acquiesced in by a superior servant[49] or by the fact that other servants adopted the same method of doing the same work.[50] In order to constitute contributory negligence, however, there must be reason to apprehend danger;[51] and the act causing the injury must be such as would not have been committed by a man of ordinary prudence.[52] The fact that, as between two apparently safe positions, a servant fails to choose the one which proves to be safe in fact cannot be ascribed to him as negligence.[53]

Under the last clear chance doctrine, discussed supra § 423, the fact that a servant has unnecessarily placed himself in a dangerous position will not bar a recovery where the master might, by the exercise of ordinary care, have discovered his danger and avoided injuring him.[54]

(2) Riding in Dangerous Position

Unnecessarily riding in a position known to be dangerous is such contributory negligence of a servant as will bar a recovery for injury to the servant.

An employee who unnecessarily rides in a dangerous position known by him to be such is guilty of such contributory negligence as will bar a recovery.[55] This principle has been applied where the servant unnecessarily rides on the pilot[56] or tender of an engine,[57] or where he places himself in a position on a motor where he is liable to sustain injury, in case of collision,[58] or where he rides on the top of a freight train voluntarily and not within the line of his employment,[59] or rides on a platform with his legs hanging over the side,[60] or rides on an engine instead of a shanty car provided for him.[61] However, riding from work on a flat car instead of in a caboose is not necessarily negligence;[62] and it has been held that an employee is not guilty of contributory negligence, precluding a recovery, in riding on the rear of a motor truck, with his legs dangling, where the cab is occupied and there are no seats on the bed of the truck.[63]

§ 447. —— Duty to Discover or Remedy Defects

a. Obvious defects and dangers
b. Latent defects and dangers
c. Opportunity to discover or remedy
d. Duty to notify master
e. Scope of employment

a. Obvious Defects and Dangers

A servant is bound to observe open and obvious defects and dangers which would be disclosed by the exercise of ordinary care, and may be guilty of contributory negligence, barring a recovery, if he fails to discharge such duty.

A servant is bound to observe open and obvious defects and dangers in tools, machinery, appliances, and places[64] such as would be disclosed or observed by the exercise of ordinary care,[65] and if he is injured by reason of a failure of his duty in this respect he is chargeable with contributory negligence which will preclude a recovery.[66] A servant's right to rely on an inspection by the master or his representative, discussed supra § 428, may excuse him from making a formal inspection, but it does not excuse him from exercising the usual and necessary care to observe obvious defects or dangers;[67] nor is his failure to exercise such care excused by the fact that he does not speak English[68] or by the fact that it is not the custom to make an inspection for the defect.[69]

b. Latent Defects and Dangers

(1) In general
(2) Where servant charged with duty of inspection and repair

(1) In General

Generally a servant is under no duty to discover latent defects or dangers not open to ordinary observation or to remedy such defects.

In accordance with the general rules, discussed supra §§ 428–430, that a servant has the right to rely on the performance by the master or his authorized agents of the duties imposed on the master for the protection of his servants to furnish suitable tools, appliances, places for work, etc., to inspect them from time to time to see that they are in a reasonably safe condition, and to maintain them in that condition, it follows, in the absence of contract or statute, or of requirements imposed by the method of work itself, discussed infra subdivision b (2) of this section, that in all cases where this doctrine is applicable the servant is under no obligation to inspect as to whether the master or his authorized agents have been negligent in this respect,[70] and therefore generally is under no obligation to examine the tools, appliances, places of work, etc., or to discover latent defects or dangers not open to ordinary observation,[71] nor is he under a duty to reme-

This rule is especially applicable where the servant has received assurances of safety from the master,[73] or has been directed to use the particular appliance or place,[74] or where there is a person specially employed to make repairs when necessary,[75] or where the appliance has been constantly used for the purpose for which the servant is using it.[76] It has been held that as far as the servant's rights and duties are concerned the question is, not whether he exercised care to discover the defects, but whether the defects and dangers were known to him or were so obvious that they were or should have been seen by him,[77] and the servant's means of knowledge of such defects are not to be considered as equal to those of the master.[78]

Particular applications. The doctrine that the servant may assume that the master has furnished him with a reasonably safe place to work and reasonably safe tools and appliances for the performance of the work, and that he is under no obligation to make an inspection for latent defects or dangers, has been applied with respect to the following tools, appliances, machinery, places of work, etc.: Automobiles,[79] barrels,[80] brakes,[81] bridges[82] or other overhead structures,[83] cable ties,[84] cant hooks,[85]

(2) Where Servant Charged with Duty of Inspection and Repair

A servant charged with the duty of inspecting machinery, appliances, or places of work which he is using, or with the duty of inspecting and repairing them, cannot recover for injuries sustained because of a neglect of such duty as to defects which might have been discovered or repaired by the exercise of reasonable care.

Where by statute, the terms of the employment, including the rules of the employer, or by reason of the nature of the work, the servant is charged with the duty of inspecting the machinery, appliances, or places of work which he is using, or with the duty of both inspecting and repairing them, he cannot recover for injuries sustained because of defects in such machinery or appliances or places of work if he neglects his duty in this respect, and if the defects are such as are discoverable by proper inspection.[42] This rule also applies if the omission of duty is that of other servants under him, whose acts in keeping the appliances in order he is charged with the duty to oversee.[43] This duty of making an inspection may arise from the servant's superior knowledge[44] or from the custom and practice of employees in the same work.[45] It has been held that a neglect of the duty under consideration will bar a recovery although the servant's superior expressed the opinion that the appliances were safe.[46]

The duty of making an inspection and repairing, however, does not apply where the servant has been directed by a superior not to make repairs[47] or where the servant, although he is the managing servant, was not in charge when the installation of machinery was completed,[48] nor does it apply to defects in complicated machinery which arise from the application of mechanical principles in its construction.[49]

Degree of care necessary. Ordinary and reasonable care and diligence is the degree of care required of the servant in the performance of the duty under consideration,[50] such care for his own safety as his own knowledge and skill in his employment make reasonably possible,[51] for, although the servant is charged with the duty of inspection and repair, this does not make him an insurer of his own safety.[52] Where inspection is required by rules of the employer, without prescribing specific acts of inspection, the duty of inspection is measured by the general standards of the law of the state.[53]

c. Opportunity to Discover or Remedy

A servant's failure to discover or remedy defects is contributory negligence only where he neglects to avail himself of an opportunity to discover them.

In order to charge a servant with contributory negligence for failure to observe or remedy defects it must appear that he had, and neglected to avail himself of, an opportunity to discover them;[54] and

Mines

(1) Under a statute requiring the inspection of a mine to be made by the mine foreman or his assistants, a miner who is acting as mine foreman has the duty to see that the mine is safe and that the roof of the mine is adequately propped, notwithstanding he has failed to pass an examination held by the department of mines and minerals for the purpose of obtaining a certificate of qualification to act as mine foreman in accordance with the statute; and accordingly, where such miner is killed by a rock falling from the roof of the mine, recovery cannot be had from the mine owner who is not operating under the workmen's compensation act.—McGhee's Adm'r v. Elcomb Coal Co., 156 S.W.2d 868, 288 Ky. 540.

(2) Where lineman was not acting as alter ego of telephone company, his duty of ascertaining safety of pole which broke and fell with him when he was working on it did not extend to the examination and inspection required of company by law in maintaining safe place for lineman to work. –Peninsular Telephone Co. v. accordingly a servant is not chargeable with contributory negligence if his failure to inspect and repair a defect is caused by the master.[55] If the nature of a servant's duties or the exigencies of the occasion are such as to require his whole attention, he is not required to anticipate, look for, or expect danger,[56] especially where it arises from the discharge of a duty outside his usual routine.[57]

d. Duty to Notify Master

A servant who has actual or constructive knowledge of defects which render his work dangerous, and fails to report such defects to the master in order that they may be repaired, ordinarily is guilty of contributory negligence which will bar a recovery by him for injuries sustained by reason of such defects.

While there is some authority apparently to the contrary,[58] it is generally held that, where a servant has knowledge, or is chargeable with knowledge, of defects which render his work dangerous, and fails to report such defects to the master, or to his authorized agent, in order that they may be remedied, he is guilty of such contributory negligence as will bar his right of recovery for injuries sustained by him by reason of such defects.[59] However, there is no absolute duty resting on the servant to notify the master of defects, but the question depends on numerous considerations, such as the duty of the employee in other directions,[60] knowledge or absence of it on the part of the master,[61] the character of the defect, whether serious or trifling,[62] or the apparent imminence of danger from the defects, etc.;[63] and it has been held that the servant is only under obligation to report such defects as impress him as needing correction or which he is told to report.[64] If the master or one representing him knows of the defect, the servant is under no duty to report the defect;[65] nor is the servant under any duty to report the defect to another servant who is not his superior.[66] A servant's duty to report when machinery is found in a dangerous condition does not obtain where it is as originally constructed and arranged, but only where it has become dangerous by misplacement or accident.[67]

Defects after repair. If the master is guilty of negligence in making a repair, it has been held that no duty devolves on the servant to notify the master of the failure of a machine to operate properly thereafter.[68]

e. Scope of Employment

A servant generally is bound to discover defects and dangers only with respect to tools, appliances, and places which are within the scope of his employment.

The rule requiring inspection and repair applies only to tools and appliances with which the servant works directly, that is, tools and appliances intrusted to him by the master for the purpose of performing a particular duty assigned to him,[69] and does not apply to other tools and devices furnished by the master in connection with the work being done and used by other employees.[70] A servant is not bound to investigate for himself a department of

§ 448. Dangerous Operations and Methods of Work

The general rules of contributory negligence, with their limitations and qualifications, apply as to the negligence of a servant with respect to dangerous operations and methods of work.

The general rules of contributory negligence, as well as their limitations and qualifications, discussed supra §§ 421–445, including the last clear chance doctrine, apply as to the negligence of servants with respect to dangerous operations and methods of work.[74] Particular applications of this rule are discussed infra §§ 449–453.

§ 449. —— Undertaking Dangerous Work

a. In general
b. Control of, or connection with, cause or subject of danger

a. In General

A servant's undertaking of dangerous work, required by the nature of his employment, is not contributory negligence unless the danger is so obvious and imminent that an ordinarily prudent person would not undertake the work.

It is not contributory negligence for a servant to undertake dangerous work, where it is required by the nature of his employment,[75] unless he voluntarily and unnecessarily exposes himself to the danger,[76] or unless the danger is so obvious and imminent that an ordinarily prudent person would not consent to undertake such work;[77] and under a so-called "simple-tool doctrine" a servant is negligent if by using a simple tool he subjects himself to a glaring and obvious danger.[78] Nevertheless, where the work in which a servant is engaged is in itself dangerous, or where the servant knows, or ought to know, that the method of work adopted involves danger, he is bound to exercise ordinary care to avoid injury therefrom.[79]

b. Control of, or Connection with, Cause or Subject of Danger

A servant who has control of, or is connected with, the cause or subject of danger is chargeable with contributory negligence precluding a recovery for injury if he fails to exercise ordinary care with respect thereto.

Subject to the rules of proximate cause, discussed supra §§ 440–445, where the servant has control of, or is connected with, the cause or subject of danger he is chargeable with contributory negligence precluding a recovery for injury if he fails to exercise ordinary care with respect thereto.[80] This rule applies where the servant, as a part of his employment, is required to make his place of work safe,[81] and it is particularly applicable where the duty of seeing that safety requirements are complied with is imposed on the servant by statute, such as by an employers' liability act.[82] This rule also applies where the place for work becomes unsafe through the fault of the servant, although it is the duty of the master to see that such places are kept safe.[83]

A superior servant may not recover for injuries due to the neglect of an employee hired by him and under his direction and control for defects in the construction and maintenance of appliances which it was his duty to construct and maintain;[84] but the employee may recover for injuries sustained by neglect in this respect, which is chargeable to the superior servant alone, although the employee assisted him in the work.[85]

§ 450. —— Selection of Unsafe Method Where Reasonably Safe Method Exists

a. In general

b. Degree of care required in selecting method of work

a. In General

A servant who knowingly adopts an unsafe method of doing his work, when a safe, or reasonably safe, method is available, is generally chargeable with contributory negligence precluding a recovery for injury if the danger is such as an ordinarily prudent man would not have incurred. A servant is not necessarily negligent in selecting one of two reasonably safe methods of work or in selecting the only method open to him.

The general rule is well settled that, where two ways of doing the work are open to the servant, one of which is unsafe and the other safe or reasonably so, he owes to his employer the duty of pursuing the safe, or reasonably safe, method,[86] and, subject to the rules of proximate cause discussed supra § 443, if he knowingly adopts the unsafe method and is injured he is chargeable with contributory negligence barring a recovery if the danger was such as an ordinarily prudent man would not have incurred.[87] It has been held that the adoption of the unsafe method of work under such circumstances in

Where salesman, while being driven by his superior with other employees to employer's zone meeting, participated in drinking with others, knew that his superior was drunk and driving carelessly, and made no protest against such driving, but acquiesced therein, salesman was so negligent as to preclude recovery for injuries sustained when the automobile left the road.—Lewis v. itself constitutes contributory negligence or, as otherwise expressed, constitutes contributory negligence as a matter of law.[88] This rule has been held to apply irrespective of the degree of danger involved in the unsafe method of work,[89] and even though the servant's act in selecting such method may not have amounted to actual rashness.[90] It has also been held to apply although the employer may also have been negligent[91] except where the unsafe method is rendered so by the employer's negligence, and such fact is unknown to the employee when making his choice,[92] or where by statute, such as the Federal Employers' Liability Act, contributory negligence is not available as a defense in such a case.[93]

The rule has been held to be especially applicable where the method chosen was not only hazardous, but could, under no circumstances, have been effective in the performance of the work,[94] or where a reasonably safe method of doing the work had been provided by the master;[95] or where at the time of the injury the servant was acting in disobedience of the rules, orders, and instructions of the master,[96] unless the method he was directed to use was equally as dangerous as the method he employed.[97]

The mere fact alone, however, that a servant adopts a dangerous way to perform work when a safe or reasonably safe way is open to the servant does not necessarily constitute negligence.[98] Regard must be had to the circumstances of each particular case.[99] In order to render the rule operative against the servant it must appear that a safe or reasonably safe method of doing the work was available to the servant,[1] that he knew, or in the exercise of reasonable care should have known, of the existence of such method,[2] that the selection of the unsafe method was voluntary on his part,[3] that he knew or was chargeable with knowledge of the danger inhering in the method chosen,[4] and that the danger was so imminent and threatening that a man of ordinary prudence would not have taken the chances of encountering it.[5] It has been held that the servant is not chargeable with contributory negligence in choosing the more dangerous method if the work could not be done as well and efficiently by the safer method;[6] but the servant will not be excused for selecting the dangerous method of work by reason of the fact that it is easier or more convenient.[7]

Methods reasonably safe. Where there are two natural ways of performing work, each of which is reasonably safe and yet one is safer than the other, the servant is not necessarily guilty of negligence in not choosing the safer way.[8] Where two courses are open to an employee in the discharge of his duty, and each is attended, under normal conditions, with practically the same degree of safety, it is not negligence for him to take one course rather than the other.[9] A servant is not necessarily chargeable with negligence where, in the discharge of his duties, he adopts the less dangerous of two dangerous methods.[10]

Both methods intended for servant's use. Where there are two ways by which the servant may do a particular thing, one dangerous and the other not so hazardous, both, however, furnished by the master, with the intention that the employee may at his discretion use either, then it does not lie in the mouth of the former to say to the latter that he cannot recover because he chose the more hazardous way.[11]

Only one method open to servant. A servant ordinarily is not chargeable with negligence in adopting the only course open to him to do the work which he is employed to do,[12] especially where the course adopted is the one usually used,[13] unless it is so obviously dangerous that an ordinarily prudent man would not adopt it.[14]

b. Degree of Care Required in Selecting Method of Work

In choosing between dangerous methods and those which are safe or reasonably so, a servant is required to exercise only ordinary care.

In making a choice between dangerous methods and those which are safe or reasonably so, a servant is required to exercise only ordinary care,[15] that is to say, the care to be expected of a man of ordinary prudence and presence of mind.[16] In balancing ways for the purpose of making a choice between two ways of doing work, the servant is not required to make a choice unerring in the light of after events, but only such choice as, under the circumstances, a reasonably prudent man might have made.[17]

§ 451. —— Attempting Work with Insufficient Help

A servant who attempts to do his work without, or with insufficient, help when help is available is generally chargeable with contributory negligence.

It is contributory negligence for a servant to attempt to do his work without, or with insufficient, help where sufficient help is available, and he fails to call for assistance.[18] On the other hand, where the servant's superior told him to get other help, but, by reason of the fact that the other help was not within his control, they refused to assist him and, by reason of insufficient help, he sustained the injuries complained of, he could not be held guilty of contributory negligence although he did not notify the superior that the men to whom he had been referred refused to assist him.[19] A servant is not chargeable with contributory negligence in proceeding without sufficient help, on his master's failure to furnish additional help, as promised,[20] unless the danger of so proceeding is so obvious and imminent that a man of ordinary prudence would refuse to proceed with the work without help.[21] It has also been held that if the servant is led to believe by his employer that he can do the assigned work without any immediate danger, he may recover for his injury if he exercised reasonable care, although without sufficient help and instruments.[22]

§ 452. —— Adopting Customary Methods

A servant is not chargeable with contributory negligence in adopting a customary method of work unless the danger therefrom is so obvious that an ordinarily prudent person would not follow the custom.

A servant is not chargeable with contributory negligence in adopting a method of work which is usual and customary[23] unless the danger therefrom is so obvious that an ordinarily prudent person would not consent to follow the custom.[24] Where there is a safe, or reasonably safe, way to do work, which to the servant's knowledge is the customary way, and he adopts another way, generally he is chargeable with contributory negligence.[25] However, it has been held that failure to adopt customary methods of work may be waived by the employer,[26] and is waived where the master assures the servant that the way adopted is safe.[27] A servant cannot offer the excuse that it was not his practice to perform a duty primarily cast on him when that failure is primarily the cause of his injury.[28]

In accordance with the rules relating to dangerous operations and methods of work, discussed supra §§ 448–452, where, in the operation of a railroad or of its locomotives, cars, etc., the way adopted by the servant for the performance of his work is safe under ordinary circumstances, he cannot, in general, be charged with negligence in so doing,[29] as where the way adopted is the one customarily used and is not any more dangerous than another available way;[30] nor ordinarily is he chargeable with contributory negligence where the way adopted is necessary, or the only way, for doing the work.[31]

Adopting unsafe method of operation. In the absence of statute it has been generally held that, where there are two ways open to a servant for the performance of his duty, one unsafe and the other safe or reasonably so, if the servant voluntarily adopts the unsafe way and is injured by reason thereof, he is guilty of such contributory negligence as will bar a recovery,[32] and this rule is particularly applicable where the duty is performed in a manner which is neither authorized nor customary.[33] However, the fact that the work is done in the usual and customary manner may excuse the servant for using the more hazardous method of performing the service,[34] especially where the work has always been done that way to the knowledge of the employer,[35] although, as has been held, the test of negligence in such a case is not the custom, but what a reasonably prudent person would do under similar circumstances.[36] This principle has no application where the method adopted for performing the service is obviously and imminently dangerous, as under such circumstances the fact that another servant customarily did likewise will not relieve a servant injured in so doing from the charge of contributory negligence;[37] and a custom will not in any event excuse the servant from exercising ordinary care.[38]

Method safe except for violation of duty by another servant. Where the way adopted by the servant for the performance of his duty would not be dangerous except for violation of duty by another servant, he is not chargeable with contributory negligence in adopting such method,[39] particularly where he is not warned, or has no reason to anticipate such violation.[40]

If the servant has control of, or is connected with, the cause or subject of danger and his injury is caused by his failure to exercise ordinary care, he cannot recover,[41] as where a servant in charge of a locomotive or car operates it at an excessive speed.[42]

Under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, § 1 et seq, 45 U.S.C.A. § 51 et seq, a railroad employee is not necessarily precluded from recovering for injuries sustained through the railroad's negligence or violation of statutes by reason of the fact that he selected an unnecessarily dangerous method of performing his duties[43] or by the fact that he departed from the customary practice of railroad employees in performing his duties.[44]

(2) Coupling or Uncoupling Cars

A railroad employee is generally chargeable with contributory negligence if he voluntarily and knowingly adopts an unsafe method in coupling or uncoupling cars when a safe method is available.

The terms "coupling" and "uncoupling" have been used to denote the acts of connecting and disconnecting the air hose between cars, if necessary in order to connect or disconnect the cars.[45] "Coupling automatically" means a coupling of cars by impact, which cars may be uncoupled without the necessity of the men going between them.[46] The preparation or alignment of the drawhead or coupler, preparatory to the impact of the cars, constitutes a part of coupling automatically.[47]

Where there is a safe method of coupling or uncoupling cars and the servant voluntarily and knowingly adopts an unsafe method of performing such duty,[48] as where he fails to use the appliances provided for such purpose,[49] generally he is chargeable with such contributory negligence as will bar a recovery for injuries sustained thereby except where such defense is barred by statute.[50] However, where the servant is doing the work in the usual and customary manner, the alternative of choosing a safer way in which to do the work is not presented,[51] especially where the work has always been done that way to the knowledge of the employer.[52] The servant is not chargeable with contributory negligence in not adopting the safer way, if he could not do the work as well by adopting that way,[53] or in making a coupling by the safer of one of two methods available;[54] nor is he chargeable with negligence in making a coupling by a method which would not have been dangerous except for a violation of duty by another servant.[55]

Going between cars to couple or uncouple them, where there is a safe method for doing this work, will as a general rule constitute negligence, barring a recovery for injuries sustained, in the absence of an emergency requiring a selection of the dangerous method.[56] Nevertheless, going between cars to uncouple them is not necessarily negligence;[57] the practice may be justified by showing that it was universally adopted in the master's yards and used with his knowledge and approval for years, without any rule to the contrary being promulgated.[58]

ed under the circumstances of the case.[59]

(3) Switching Cars

A servant who voluntarily adopts an unsafe method, when a safe or reasonably safe method is available, in switching cars is generally held chargeable with contributory negligence.

As a general rule, where two ways are open to a servant in the performance of his duty in switching cars or in assisting to do so, one of the ways being safe or reasonably so and the other dangerous, and the servant voluntarily adopts the unsafe way and is injured, he will be held guilty of such contributory negligence as will bar a recovery.[60] If the servant engaged in switching cars has control of, or is connected with, the cars or subject of danger and his injury is due to his failure to exercise ordinary care with respect thereto, he cannot recover.[61] A servant, however, is not negligent in assuming a position for making a switch, where he acts under the direct orders of his superiors and where the duty cannot be performed by him from any other position,[62] or where the position taken by him is not of itself dangerous and can become so only by the violation of duty on the part of a superior servant;[63] nor is he necessarily chargeable with contributory negligence in pursuing the more dangerous method if he acts in good faith in doing so and the method adopted is one which a reasonable and prudent person would ordinarily adopt under like circumstances.[64]

Flying switches. Making a "flying switch" is not negligence per se as to the servant performing it,[65] although it has been held to constitute negligence if the car has no brakeman on it, and is under no control, when the flying switch is attempted.[66]

(4) Boarding or Alighting from Moving Cars or Locomotives

Ordinarily it is not contributory negligence for a brakeman or other train hand to board or alight from a moving car or locomotive, in the discharge of his duties, unless he voluntarily adopts a dangerous method for so doing when a safe or reasonably safe method is available.

Ordinarily boarding or alighting from moving cars or locomotives, by brakemen or other train hands in the discharge of their duties, is not contributory negligence;[67] but where there is a safe or reasonably safe way to board[68] or alight from[69] a moving car or engine, and the servant voluntarily adopts a dangerous method of so doing and is injured in consequence thereof, he is guilty of such contributory negligence as will ordinarily bar a recovery, as where he attempts to board a moving car or engine while he is standing in the middle of the track.[70]

Where the method adopted is obviously and imminently dangerous, the fact that it is the custom of other servants to do likewise will not relieve the servant so doing from the charge of contributory negligence.[71] It is contributory negligence for a servant to attempt to board an engine or train which is moving at a high rate of speed.[72] However, in accordance with a well-settled principle considered supra § 423, the contributory negligence of the servant will not bar a recovery where the peril in which he had placed himself was discovered by the master in time to avoid injuring him.[73]

b. Operation of Machinery

The voluntary operation of machinery in an unsafe manner, when it is capable of being operated in a safe or reasonably safe manner, generally constitutes contributory negligence.

In accordance with the rules discussed supra §§ 446–452 as to dangerous operations and methods of work, where there is an unsafe way of starting, adjusting, operating, oiling, cleaning, repairing, or stopping machinery and a way that is safe or reasonably so, and the servant knowingly and voluntarily adopts the unsafe way and is injured in consequence, he will, as a general rule, be held guilty of contributory negligence barring a recovery.[75] This principle has been applied where the servant was injured while attempting to oil,[76] to clean,[77] or to make necessary adjustments of machinery[78] while in motion, or to remove obstructions or refuse from or near moving machinery,[79] or where a servant attempted to take hold of and pull off a piece of string or cloth from a revolving roller,[80] or where a servant used machinery known to him to be dangerous because of its erratic motion.[81] A custom of employees to remove with their hands matter which clogs machinery will not relieve a servant of the charge of contributory negligence where such method of work is obviously and imminently dangerous.[82]

c. Mining

Ordinarily a miner is not chargeable with contributory negligence if he pursues his work in the customary manner; but he is chargeable with negligence if he pursues a method which is obviously dangerous, or if he pursues an unsafe method of work when a safe method is available.

In accordance with the rules relating to dangerous operations and methods of work, discussed supra §§ 448–452, where a miner does his work in the customary manner or as he is expected to do, ordinarily he is not chargeable with contributory negligence,[83] although the method of doing the work is attended with some hazard.[84] On the other hand, he is chargeable with contributory negligence where he pursues a method of work which is obviously and imminently dangerous,[85] particularly where he has sole charge and control of the instrumentality by which he is injured,[86] or where there are two methods of doing work open to a miner, one of which is unsafe and the other safe or reasonably so, and he voluntarily with full knowledge of the facts and probable consequences uses the more dangerous method.[87] If a miner knowingly undertakes work with insufficient help and is injured, he cannot recover,[88] especially where he has been warned of the danger.[89]

Although a coal miner made the mine room in which he was killed by the falling of its roof, and thereby made the defect in roof which caused it to fall, and knew of the defect and voluntarily went under it, he was not guilty of contributory negligence unless he knew the defect was dangerous, it being the operator's duty to prop the roof or to maintain it in a reasonably safe condition.—Mascott Coal Co. v. arising from defective or dangerous machinery, appliances, tools, or places as an ordinarily prudent man would take under the same or similar circumstances, especially where the servant is in control of the cause or subject of danger.

In accordance with the general rules of contributory negligence, as well as their limitations and qualifications, as a general rule a servant is bound to take such precautions against known or apparent dangers arising from defective or dangerous machinery, appliances, tools, or places as an ordinarily prudent man would take under the same or similar circumstances, and if he fails to take such precautions he may not recover for the injuries thereby sustained;[90] and this is especially true where the servant is himself in control of the cause or subject of danger.[91] A reliance on custom or assurances of safety will not excuse a failure to take such precautions against known or apparent dangers.[92] This duty to take precautions is as obligatory on the servant as the duty of the master to provide a reasonably safe place to work and reasonably safe appliances and machinery[93] or as the master's duty to warn the servant of dangers.[94]

The general rule, however, does not apply to dangers which cannot be reasonably anticipated[95] or avoided;[96] nor does it apply where the nature of the servant's duties is such as to take up his whole attention[97] or where his knowledge is not sufficient to charge him with knowledge of the danger.[98] The fact that the servant had knowledge of one defect does not necessarily charge him with contributory negligence with respect to another defect unless it appears that, with the knowledge he had, under the circumstances he acted imprudently in using an ap-

Requesting cigarette from chauffeur
The mere fact that an employee of an automobile owner, while riding in an automobile operated by the owner's chauffeur, requested a cigarette which the chauffeur handed her shortly before the accident, will not preclude a recovery by the employee, if the act were negligent, since a jury might conclude that the employee had a right to assume that an act such as the passing of a cigarette is commonly performed by experienced chauffeurs while engaged in the operation of a car and may be accomplished without hazard.—Sylvia v. pliance.[99]

Rules and warnings for servant's protection. The general rule is subject to the limitation that the servant has the right to assume that rules formulated by the master for the protection of his servants in the performance of their duties will be observed,[1] and also that warnings will be given to him, when a perilous situation arises, where the right to such warning is established by custom.[2]

The general rule has been applied where an employee operated a grinding machine without a mask, at a time when a fan and exhaust pipes furnished to carry off dust were not functioning;[3] where an engineer placed his hand in an automatic stoker without fully shutting off the steam;[4] where an engine operator and foreman crossed a pit or plank which he knew to be loose and dangerous;[5] where an experienced chauffeur operated a machine, the brakes of which he knew to be defective;[6] where a motorman used a fuse furnished him which he knew to be defective and dangerous;[7] where a servant stepped upon a cover of a blow tank containing steam, hot water, and grease which cover went down with his weight;[8] where a servant took shelter under a car during a storm,[9] tripped over a foot scraper plainly visible outside the master's office,[10] used a defective ladder,[11] or went upon a scaffold apparently and obviously in process of dismantlement;[12] where a telephone lineman on descending a pole stepped on a grounded telegraph cable and grasped an iron brace with which the company's wire was in contact, the insulation of the wire being worn off at the place of contact and the dangerous condition being obvious to casual observation;[13] and where a window washer accustomed to the building and having had opportunity for inspection was precipitated to the ground and killed because the window sash to which he held pulled out.[14]

Blasting. An experienced member of a railroad construction crew engaged in blasting operations must protect himself from the dangers incident thereto,[15] including the manner of setting off a blast[16] and the seeking of a place of safety during such operations[17] unless his duties require him to remain at a dangerous place.[18]

Last clear chance. In accordance with the last clear chance doctrine, discussed supra § 423, recovery is not barred by the failure of the servant to take proper precautions for his safety where his position of peril was discovered in time to avoid injury to him by the use of ordinary care.[19]

§ 455. —— Duty of Servant to Give Warnings or Signals

A servant who in the course of his duties assumes a position of danger is under a duty to use all available means to give a warning or signal thereof to his master and other servants.

Where, in the performance of his duties, a servant assumes a position of danger he is bound to use all available means to give a warning or signal thereof to his master and other servants, and may not recover for injuries caused by his failure to do so[20] or by his failure to observe that his signals were not noticed.[21] The fact that the employee does not realize his peril does not relieve him from the duty of giving such notice.[22] Where, however, the servant has given due notice that he has assumed a position of danger, he has the right to assume that no movement which might result in injury to him will be made without giving him timely notice;[23] and where a servant is injured through the negligence of another servant in disobeying instructions given by the servant who was injured, and the instructions given were plain, the injured servant is not necessarily guilty of contributory negligence in failing to make the other servant understand or comprehend the instructions.[24]

a. Servants on or about Cars or Locomotives

(1) In general
(2) Going between or under cars or engines
(3) Guarding against obstructions on or near track

(1) In General

A servant on or about a car or locomotive must take such precautions against known or obvious dangers inherent in the work in which he is engaged as an ordinarily prudent man would take under the same or similar circumstances.

In accordance with the general rules discussed supra § 454, a servant on or about a car or locomotive must take such precautions against known or obvious dangers inherent in the work in which he is engaged as an ordinarily prudent man would take under the same or similar circumstances, and if injuries result from a neglect of this duty, there may be no recovery,[25] especially where the servant has placed himself in a position where his peril may not be easily discovered,[26] and the duty of taking such care is a continuing one.[27] Nevertheless, in the performance of his duties such a servant is entitled to assume that rules or directions for the performance of the work by others engaged in the service will be complied with, and he is under no obligation to take precautions which are unnecessary if the rules or directions have been complied with,[28] or to guard against unanticipated dangers,[29]

(1) A train conductor standing on the running board of the tender, in the daytime, at a highway crossing being used by steady stream of traffic, to protect train and warn others of its approach, was guilty of contributory negligence in failing to see that engineer gave crossing signals or stopped train and to signal engineer or fireman to reduce speed, if train was traveling too rapidly, or in voluntarily placing himself in such position that he could not give such signals.—Hilton v. or to do an act to prevent or minimize his injuries, if his efforts will be unavailing.[30]

(2) Going between or under Cars or Engines

A railroad employee is bound to exercise such care as a reasonably prudent man would exercise under the same or like circumstances in the performance of duties which require him to go between or under cars or engines, as by giving notice of his position.

Employees of railroad companies, whose duties require them to go between or under cars or engines, are bound to exercise such care as reasonably prudent men would exercise under the same or similar circumstances.[31] An employee is chargeable with such contributory negligence as will bar a recovery for injuries sustained where, without giving notice to other proper employees of the dangerous position he has assumed, he goes between cars to make couplings or to uncouple them or to make repairs or to discharge other duties,[32] or where he goes under cars[33] or engines[34] to inspect or repair them,[35] or to clean out ash pans,[36] unless it is actually known by such other employees that he is in such a position of danger,[37] and in such a case he has a right to rely on the assurance of a foreman or superior employee that a proper signal or warning of his dangerous position has been given.[38]

Nevertheless, the servant has the right to assume that the company will conduct its business with reasonable regard to its rules and with reasonable care for his safety while in the performance of his duties in coupling and uncoupling cars;[39] and, where the servant has given due notice that he has assumed a position of danger, he has the right to assume that no movement will be made of the car under which he is working without notice to him, and he is not guilty of contributory negligence in assuming any position which is necessary or convenient for the doing of the work in which he is engaged,[40] and it has been held that a brakeman is not under an absolute duty to stop, look, and listen before crossing between cars to another track merely because the track is a place of danger.[41] It has also been held that it is not contributory negligence for a car repairer to go under cars while standing on sidetracks where they are repaired, without stationing anyone to watch for approaching trains, if it is known to the yardmaster that repairs are to be made there.[42] A car repairer who properly places signal flags before going under cars to make repairs cannot be held guilty of contributory negligence where he is injured by a train on another track striking the cars under which he was working, they being too close to the switch to be clear.[43]

(3) Guarding against Obstructions on or near Track

Railroad employees engaged in the operation of cars or trains, such as engineers, firemen, motormen, conductors, brakemen, and others, are bound to look out for, and guard against, obstructions or erections on, near, or over the track.

Danger caused by accident
Although a rule requires trains to aproach time-table stations under control, "expecting to find the main track occupied," the engineer of the second section of a train is not chargeable with knowledge that the front section is there, when, but for an accident, unknown to him, it would have passed on before his arrival.—Louisville & N. Railroad employees engaged in the operation of cars or trains, such as engineers, firemen, motormen, conductors, brakemen, and others, are bound to look out for, and guard against, obstructions or erections on, near, or over the track, the existence and the dangerous nature of which are known to or should be known to them in the exercise of ordinary care, and if such an employee neglects his duty in this regard he is chargeable with contributory negligence, barring a recovery for injuries sustained,[44] as where by reason of his failure to exercise such care a brakeman riding on the top of a freight car is injured by an overhead bridge,[45] or where an employee fails to look out for signals for the safety of the train as well as for himself, and is injured by an obstruction near the track.[46]

On the other hand, if the employee makes a reasonable effort to avoid injury from an obstruction over the track which he knew to be dangerous he is not chargeable with contributory negligence.[47] So also, if the employee is injured by an obstruction negligently placed too near the track, a recovery for the injury so sustained is authorized where he had no knowledge of the obstruction or the danger incident thereto and was not chargeable with such knowledge under the circumstances and surroundings;[48] and he is not chargeable with such knowledge unless the defect or danger is so obvious that reasonable observation would have brought it to his notice[49] or unless he has been warned of it.[50] Where a motorman fails to see a car standing on the track by reason of the confusing effect of the headlight of a car coming on a parallel track, and is injured in consequence, he is not chargeable with negligence in failing to slacken speed because of the effect of the headlight of the other car.[51]

b. Servants Operating Hand Cars, Velocipedes, Tricycles, or Speeders

Railroad employees who operate hand cars, velocipedes, tricycles, or speeders must take such precautions against the obvious hazards of the work in hand as an ordinarily prudent man would take under the same or similar circumstances, and generally are chargeable with contributory negligence if they fail to do so.

Railroad employees who operate hand cars, velocipedes, tricycles, or speeders in the course of their duties for the railroad are bound to take such precautions against the obvious hazards of the work in hand as would be taken by ordinarily prudent men under the same or similar circumstances, and generally are chargeable with contributory negligence if they fail to take such precautions.[52] It is their duty to keep a lookout for trains or cars[53] and to get their cars or vehicles and themselves out of the way.[54] It is also their duty to keep a lookout for other vehicles at a crossing.[55] In the absence of statute, such an employee is chargeable with contributory negligence, barring a recovery for injuries sustained, if, after seeing an approaching train, he has sufficient time and opportunity to leave a hand car on which he is riding and go to a place of safety,[56] or to remove the hand car from the Fact that hand car was out of repair, and that wheels were out of alignment and that one was bent, and that wheels sometimes had tendency to climb rails and leave track, did not make danger confronting employee so obvious, imminent, and immediately threatening as to make it imprudent for him to continue work, defeating recovery for injury.—Palmer v. Duty of foreman

A railroad section foreman who is riding on a motor car, operated by another member of the crew, and who is riding in a position near the front of the car and ahead of the operator, is under a duty to keep a lookout, and he is not relieved of this duty even though the operator is rightfully operating the car.—Wiggins v. track,[57] and fails to do so, or if he runs a hand car into a deep cut without sending a man ahead to warn a train about due,[58] or runs a railroad motor car around a curve without sending a member of the crew ahead to ascertain whether the track is clear, as required by a rule of the company.[59] It has also been held contributory negligence to start out on a speeder before an engine which the employee knows is only two miles behind.[60] However, under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, 45 U.S.C.A. § 51, et seq, the act of such a servant in exposing himself to injury by attempting to remove a motorcar from in front of an approaching train does not necessarily defeat a recovery, but it may reduce the amount of damages.[61]

Reliance on care of railroad or other servants. Employees operating hand cars and other similar vehicles have the right to assume that fellow employees will exercise care in the performance of their duties connected with the operation of such cars or vehicles[62] and that the operators of an approaching train or car will exercise reasonable care to avoid injuring them.[63] A section foreman riding on a hand car may assume that trainmen will obey a rule requiring that, when torpedoes are placed on the track, a flagman be stationed on the track to warn those approaching, and may assume that there are no torpedoes on the track, when he sees no flagman, regardless of the object of the rule.[64] A section hand, who is traveling on a hand car which is in charge of the foreman, and who looks and listens for an approaching train but does not see one, is not negligent in continuing on the car.[65]

Applying the last clear chance doctrine, discussed supra § 423, if the company could, by the exercise of ordinary care, have discovered the servant in time to avoid injuring him,[66] or could, by the exercise of ordinary care, have avoided the injury after discovering the servant's position of peril,[67] the servant may recover notwithstanding his own negligence unless he was not in a position from which he could not extricate himself and was negligent after becoming aware of his danger.[68]

(1) In General

An employee working at his post of duty on or near a railroad track must exercise such care for his safety as the danger of the surroundings would suggest to a man of ordinary prudence and as the proper attention to his duties will permit.

An employee working at his post of duty on or near a railroad track is not held to the same measure of diligence in looking out for, and taking precautions against, approaching trains as a traveler about to cross the track,[69] but he must exercise such care for his safety as the danger of the sur-

Opening switch

If a fellow employee was negligent in opening switch for motor car on which plaintiff employee was riding and signaling it to proceed and in continuing to maintain that signal in effect when gondola car was rapidly approaching from near distance, negligent failure of plaintiff to observe the rapid approach of the gondola car would not bar recovery.—Hutchins v. Reliance on subordinate to keep lookout

Operator of track car who was foreman of mowing crew which together with conductor pilot occupied track car which collided with automobile at highway crossing has been held not guilty of primary negligence in failing to observe approaching automobile so as to preclude his recovery for injuries sustained, where railroad's rules required subordinates as well as foreman to keep lookout, and foreman could reasonably rely on subordinate to keep lookout for approaching vehicles.—Westover v. Railroad employee's error of judgment in attempting to remove motor car from path of approaching train would not convict him of such recklessness as to preclude a recovery.—Moran v. Atchison, T. & S. roundings would suggest to a man of ordinary prudence and as the proper attention to his duties will permit, and, as a general rule, if he fails in this duty by reason of which he sustains injuries, there can be no recovery therefor.[70] However, this principle applies only when the action causing the injury is one naturally to be expected and not one of such an unusual character as to deprive the servant of the opportunity to protect himself,[71] although it has been held that a custom of certain trains to use the main line on all occasions does not excuse an employee for failing to exercise ordinary care in walking on a side track on the approach of such a train.[72]

In exercising such care the employee is entitled to act on the assumption that rules provided by the master for the protection of his servants in the performance of their duties will be observed[73] and also that warning will be given where a perilous situation arises, where it is customary to give such warning.[74] Where he is given to understand expressly or by custom that he may depend on being warned, he may then relax the vigilance which otherwise he must exercise;[75] but it has been held that the duty to warn the servant does not justify him in relying wholly thereon and that he is not relieved, as a general rule, from a reasonable use of his senses to ascertain the approach of an engine or cars.[76]

(2) Section Hands, Trackmen, Etc.

Section hands, trackmen, and yardmen working on or near the railroad tracks are bound to exercise such care in looking out for, and taking precautions for their own safety against, approaching trains, cars, or engines as the danger of the surroundings would suggest to an ordinarily prudent man and as the proper attention to their duties will permit.

While it has been held that section hands, trackmen, and yardmen working on or near the tracks or in the yards of a railroad company are not chargeable with the same measure of diligence in looking out for, and taking precautions against, approaching trains, cars, or engines, as travelers about to cross the track,[77] they are nevertheless bound to exercise such care for their own safety as the danger of the surroundings would suggest to an ordinarily prudent person and as the proper attention to their duties will permit; if they fail in this duty they will, in general, be barred from a recovery for injuries resulting therefrom.[78] The degree of care to be observed must be determined by the facts and circumstances of the particular case.[79]

Except in so far as the rule may be modified or limited by a custom of the company to give signals or warnings of approaching trains,[80] it has generally been held to be the duty of this class of employees to keep a lookout for trains, cars, or locomotives, and to keep out of their way,[81] whether the trains are extras or on scheduled runs[82] or whether they are reported on time or are not immediately expected.[83] The character of the work itself, it has been said, is a warning to be on the lookout.[84] An employee engaged in this line of work should not place himself in a position where he cannot see an approaching train or permit himself to become so engrossed in his work as to prevent him from protecting himself.[85]

Right to warnings or signals as affected by rule, custom or statute. Section hands, trackmen, and yardmen at work on or near the tracks or in the yard of a railroad company are entitled to assume that signals or warnings of the approach of trains, engines, or cars will be given where it is the rule or custom of the company to give such signals or warnings;[86] and in default of a compliance by the company with the duty so imposed they should be notified that for the time being they must rely on their own senses for protection.[87]

Nevertheless actual knowledge on the part of the servant will excuse a failure to give a warning or signal;[88] and the right to warnings or signals may be waived by knowledge that the customary duty of giving them is not being performed and by acceptance of the risk without objection.[89] Moreover, a section hand cannot rely on a warning signal being given where he is not in a position to avail himself of it.[90] Section hands are not entitled to rely on statutory crossing signals as the statute imposes this duty only in favor of persons crossing or intending to cross a public highway;[91] nor are they entitled to rely on other warning signals which are not intended for the class of employees to which they belong.[92]

Last clear chance or humanitarian doctrine. It has been held that the last clear chance or humanitarian doctrine discussed supra § 423, cannot be applied with as much strictness to section hands or trackmen as to passengers and strangers[93] and that the doctrine does not apply where the trainmen could not have averted the accident at any time before its occurrence, the negligence of the employee being operative up to the very instant of the accident.[94] If an engineer sees a section hand or trackman and has reason to believe that he will step off the track there is nothing, in his remaining until the last moment, to suggest to the engineer that he is oblivious of danger,[95] since an engineer approaching employees working on the track may rely on the fact that they often remain on the track until the train is dangerously close and then by a quick step put themselves out of danger,[96] and may assume that they will do so;[97] and he is not required to stop his train until the workman is discovered in

Federal rule that railroad yard and track employees must look out for trains would not apply in action under Federal Employers' Liability Act for injuries sustained by freight check clerk when freight truck, being pulled by tractor through tunnel connecting railroad station and freight room, collided with parked freight trucks between which clerk was standing, since clerk was in place where tractor and trucks pulled by it should not have gone.—Mrazek v. Some distance away from rest of the employees

A section hand working on a track cannot rely on warning being given him of the approach of trains by the foreman, where for half an hour he had been separated from the rest of the employees at work under the foreman at a place at least a hundred yards from where he was struck by the train; in these circumstances it was his duty to look out for himself.—Blute v. a perilous position.[98] However, if it appears that the employee is in danger, the engineer must use the same care to protect him that he would for anyone else, regardless of the fact that he is an employee of the company.[99]

(3) Watchmen, Flagmen, or Gatemen

A watchman, flagman, or gateman, in the course of his duty to ascertain the approach of trains and give signals, must take proper precautions against being injured by such trains.

A watchman, flagman, or gateman whose duty it is to ascertain the approach of trains and to give signals stands on a different footing from that occupied by other servants whose duty requires them to work on or near the track, and where he is injured by reason of his failure to see a train which it was his duty to observe he cannot recover therefor[1] except where the last clear chance doctrine may be invoked.[2] His duty, it has been said, is to look and listen continuously, and his failure to do so is contributory negligence.[3] A flagman running ahead of a slowly moving train is not excused from taking precautions for his own safety by his expectation that the engineer or motorman will protect him.[4]

It has been held, however, that, where after an engine had passed a crossing the flagman waved a flag showing that it was open to travel by the public and continued to wave it, it was not per se negligence for him to step on the track without looking to see whether the engine which had crossed the track was backing,[5] since he had good reason to infer that the engine would not move over the crossing while he was waving the flag, announcing that it was open to the public.[6] A bridge watchman walking along a track on which a train is approaching is not necessarily guilty of contributory negligence in crossing to the opposite track according to instructions and custom.[7]

d. Servants Crossing Tracks or Yards

A servant who is not engaged in any work which demands his attention at a time when he is crossing a track or yard is bound to see or hear approaching trains and to give his undivided attention to what is taking place about him, and he may be chargeable with contributory negligence for a nonobservance of this duty.

Except where the last clear chance doctrine may be invoked,[8] where a servant when crossing a track or yard is not engaged in the performance of any work which demands his attention, it is his duty to see and hear approaching trains and to give his undivided attention to what is taking place about him, and if he is injured by reason of a nonobservance of this requirement he may not be entitled to recover,[9] and the fact that he once looked and listened will not excuse him if he allows sufficient time to elapse for an engine or train to come into dangerous proximity and then attempts to cross without looking or listening.[10] In these circumstances the servant is held to the same measure of care in looking and listening for approaching trains as any other person lawfully passing over the track.[11] He has no right to rely on a custom to give warnings and signals given only to those servants actively engaged in the performance of services.[12] Nevertheless, a servant crossing railroad yards may rely on the observance of a rule forbidding a flying switch, and is not required to look and listen for the approach of cars cut loose from an engine in a flying switch on the track he was about to cross.[13] such precautions against known or obvious dangers as an ordinarily prudent man would take under the same or similar circumstances.

Servants working on or about elevators must take such precautions against known or obvious dangers arising therefrom as an ordinarily prudent man would take under the same or similar circumstances, and, if injury results from a failure to do so, ordinarily there can be no recovery[14] unless the accident results from a danger which he had no reason to anticipate.[15]

f. Servants Working in or about Mines

A servant working in or about a mine must take such precautions against known or obvious dangers growing out of his employment as an ordinarily prudent man would take under the same or similar circumstances.

A servant working in or about a mine must take such precautions against known or obvious dangers growing out of his employment as an ordinarily prudent man would take under the same or similar circumstances, and there can be no recovery for injuries sustained by reason of his failure to do so,[16] especially where the servant is himself in control of the cause or subject of danger.[17] However, he has the right to assume that rules promulgated for the protection of the servants in their employment will be observed.[18]

g. Servants Working about Unguarded Holes

A servant who knows there are unguarded holes about premises where he is at work may be chargeable with contributory negligence where he falls into an unguarded hole.

A servant who knows or who is chargeable with knowledge that there are unguarded holes in and about the premises where he is at work is bound to use his faculties to prevent falling into them, and if he fails to exercise ordinary care in this respect he cannot recover for injuries sustained by falling into an unguarded hole,[19] as where a longshoreman or employee of a stevedoring company, by not taking the proper precautions, falls through an open hatchway.[20] This rule, however, does not apply where, under the circumstances, no duty is imposed on the servant of anticipating such a dangerous situation.[21]

§ 457. Disobedience of Rules, Orders, or Statutes

a. In general
b. Disobedience of statute

a. In General

A servant who is injured as a consequence of his disobedience of the rules, orders, or instructions of his master is generally chargeable with such contributory negligence as will bar a recovery except to the extent that the rule has been changed by statute.

tributory negligence as will bar a recovery,[22] subject to the well-established limitation that the servant either knew, or was charged by operation of law with knowledge, of the particular rule or order involved.[23] In observing the rules and orders of the master promulgated for the safety of the servant, only reasonable care is required;[24] but it is the duty of the servant to acquaint himself with all necessary rules and, in case of injury from failure to obey them, ignorance of the rules is no excuse unless his failure to know them was not due to his want of care.[25] It also is generally necessary to the application of this doctrine that the rules or orders shall have been properly promulgated.[26]

Limitations of rule. In order for disobedience of rules, orders, or instructions to bar a recovery, it is essential that they shall be applicable to the facts of the particular case,[27] that they shall not have been abrogated by other inconsistent orders or instructions,[28] and that there has been a plain and manifestly negligent violation of the rule or order, according to its plain and obvious meaning.[29] Such rules or orders are inoperative as far as they contravene the principle which requires an employer to furnish and maintain suitable appliances and the right of employees to assume that this has been done.[30] Also the doctrine does not apply where the master learns of the danger in which the servant had placed himself in time to avoid injuring him.[31]

Contributory negligence or assumption of risk. A violation of the rules of the employer, according to some decisions, is contributory negligence and not an assumption of risk.[32] Other decisions, however, have held that a servant assumes the risk of injury from a disobedience of orders or rules of the employer, as discussed supra § 410.

Under liability acts. In accordance with the principles discussed supra § 425, under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, and also under some state statutes, a servant's violation of general cautionary rules or instructions, although amounting to contributory negligence, does not preclude a recovery for injuries sustained.[33] Where, however, he disobeys or disregards specific orders or standing rules promulgated for his safety, he may not be entitled to recover for injuries thereby sustained,[34] even though the fault or negligence of the master or other servants may have contributed to the injury.[35] If an employee willfully disobeys his orders or instructions he is chargeable with "willful negligence" under a statutory provision which precludes him from recovering in such a case.[36]

Repair of safety appliance
The primary duty rule has been held not to apply to a case in which the employee was engaged at the time of his injury in repairing a safety appliance, although his act was in violation of a company rule. —Leet v. Union Pac. R. Co., 142 P.2d 37, 60 Cal.App.2d 814.

b. Disobedience of Statute

sustained thereby;[39] but this does not prevent a recovery by another employee who is not so in charge.[40] It has also been held that the fact the employee has violated a statute designed for the protection of employees does not preclude him from recovering for the negligence of his employer or a third person;[41] nor is an employee precluded from recovering where the master has violated a statute for the protection of employees, which statute [redacted]

Rules or orders of the character under consideration are subject to a reasonable interpretation, as discussed supra § 276, and a servant is not, under all circumstances and at all hazards, bound to obey them,[44] and their violation is not negligence per se[45] unless the act constituting a violation is so opposed to prudence that no careful person would commit it.[46] Disobedience thereof will be excused where the rule or order is unreasonable,[47] or was of a temporary nature and had been annulled prior to the injury complained of,[48] or where obedience thereto was not practicable[49] or was impossible,[50] unsafe,[51] ineffectual to prevent injury,[52] or likely to accomplish disaster,[53] or where no opportunity was given to comply with the rule,[54] or where failure to comply with the rule was caused by sickness.[55] It is also an excuse for disobedience of a rule that it is susceptible of two constructions and that the servant in good faith adopts one of these constructions[56] or that a compliance with the rule would have placed the servant in a position as dangerous as that which he assumed by disobeying the rule.[57]

Generally, however, the violation of a rule by a superior servant does not excuse its violation by his inferior[58] unless he has reason to rely on the superior's acts;[59] and the act of one servant unauthorized or contrary to the rule does not justify another servant in disregarding the rule.[60] A servant also is not excused for disobedience because he thinks compliance with a rule or order unnecessary,[61] because others whose business is well regulated are in the habit of conducting it in a manner contrary to his master's rules,[62] or because his violation of the rule was caused by the fault of other servants.[63] The law that disobedience to the employer's rule in situations inherently dangerous is negligence does not apply where the situation was made dangerous by the employer's negligence.[64]

b. Customary Violation of Rules

The customary violation of rules or orders, with the knowledge and acquiescence of the master or his representative, will generally excuse a servant's disobedience of such rules or orders.

Where a rule or order is habitually violated with the knowledge and acquiescence, either actual or imputed, on the part of the master or those who are acting as his representatives, a servant generally will not be charged with contributory negligence in acting in disregard of such rule or order.[65] Under these circumstances the rule is abrogated or an observance thereof waived.[66]

However, rules and orders for the protection of the servant will not be considered as abrogated unless that conclusion is plainly warranted by the facts and necessary for the servant's protection.[67] In order to relieve the servant from the imputation of contributory negligence in failing to observe rules and orders on the ground that they had been habitually disregarded by the company's employees, it must clearly appear that such disregard of the rules and orders was actually known to, and acquiesced in by, the master or those representing him,[68] or that the custom of disregarding the rules and orders had been so open and long continued that the employer was chargeable with notice thereof.[69]

It has been held that, where the danger in violating the rule is so obvious and imminent that no prudent person would violate it, the servant is not excused in so doing, notwithstanding the rule is customarily violated with the knowledge of the master;[70] nor will he be excused for violating the rule, notwithstanding a customary violation thereof by other servants, where he has been given specific and repeated instructions not to do so, since in view of specific instructions no question of abrogation of a rule can arise.[71] Furthermore, it has been held that, where a servant enters into an express written contract to observe a rule and is injured in consequence of a violation thereof, no proof of any custom theretofore existing to the contrary will relieve the servant from the imputation of contributory negligence[72] although a customary violation of the rule subsequent to the making of the contract known to, and acquiesced in by, the master would have such effect.[73]

§ 459. —— Application of Rules

a. Operation of locomotives, trains, or cars
b. Mining
c. Handling of machinery, tools, or appliances
d. Inspection or repair
e. Giving of warning or signal by servant occupying dangerous position

(3) Riding on cars or locomotives
(4) Boarding or alighting from moving cars or locomotives

(1) In General

A railroad employee who is injured while acting in disobedience of the rules or orders of the railroad company relating to the operation of locomotives, trains, or cars is generally chargeable with contributory negligence barring a recovery except to the extent that the rule has been changed by statute.

Where a railroad employee is injured while acting in disobedience of rules or orders of the company relating to the operation of locomotives, trains, or cars, he is, in general, barred by contributory negligence from a recovery for his injuries;[74] and this rule is particularly applicable where the adoption of the unsafe method of operation, in disobedience of a rule or order, is voluntary and unnecessary.[75] A recovery, however, may be had where the rules or orders have been habitually violated with the knowledge and assent of the company,[76] as in such a case the employer cannot set up a violation as a defense to an action by a servant injured in consequence of a disobedience thereof.[77] The safety rules of a railroad company, however, ordinarily are not absolute, but must be applied according to the circumstances.[78] A failure to comply with a rule or order will not be regarded as contributory negligence, precluding a recovery, if, under the circumstances of the particular case, it is impossible to comply therewith[79] or if an observance of the rule or order renders it impossible to do the work.[80]

ployers' Liability Act, and also under some state acts, such an employee is not barred from recovering for injuries sustained as a consequence of his violation of a general cautionary rule or order;[81] but he may be barred from recovering if he is injured as a consequence of his disobedience of a specific rule or standing order of the company,[82] although the negligence of other employees has contributed to the injury[83] unless, under some statutes, the railroad company or its representatives have failed to comply with the statutory safety requirements.[84]

Particular applications. The rule precluding a recovery where the employee has disobeyed the rules or orders of the company has been applied to engineers, motormen, or firemen injured while failing to approach stations with trains under control,[85] operating engines carrying more steam than is permissible under the rules of the company, and failing to keep sufficient water in the boiler,[86] running their locomotives or cars at a rate of speed in excess of that prescribed by rules or specific orders of the company,[87] running a train ahead of schedule time,[88] running an engine or train along a track on which another train has the right of way under the rules of the railroad company,[89] running a train past a station before the arrival of another train, without a written order therefor,[90] running a train in violation of a rule prohibiting the starting of trains within a designated time after the departure of another train,[91] running a train onto a single track without orders,[92] running a train standing on a sidetrack onto the main track in disobedience of orders,[93] starting a train without receiving proper signals,[94] or violating a rule or specific order given for passing trains.[95]

In action for death of engineer because of defective locomotive furnished by railroad, facts that engineer continued to use locomotive after he knew of defective condition and failed to report it as was his duty under the rules constituted no defense where engineer's acts were all concurring acts with act of railroad in violation of the statute, and were acts of contributory negligence from the results of which the engineer was relieved of liability by the statute.—McCarthy v. ductor,[96] or one who violated a rule of the company in going upon the pilot of the engine with which he was working,[97] or one who was ordered by the conductor of a train to go to a switch and set it for a certain track and remain there until the front of his train had passed, but instead, after setting the switch, walked back to his train, and was killed in a collision which would have been prevented had he remained at the switch,[98] and also to servants making flying switches in violation of rules or orders.[99]

(2) Coupling or Uncoupling Cars

A servant who violates a rule or order of the railroad company as to the method of coupling or uncoupling cars is generally chargeable with such contributory negligence as will preclude a recovery for injuries sustained thereby.

The violation of rules or orders in which the method of coupling or uncoupling cars is prescribed by the company will constitute contributory negligence such as will generally bar a servant from recovering for injuries sustained by reason of such disobedience,[1] as where he violates a rule which forbids him from going between moving cars to couple or uncouple them[2] or which requires the use of a coupling stick;[3] and this rule is particularly applicable where the servant's act in going between moving cars is voluntary and unnecessary.[4] A recovery is not precluded, however, where the railroad company's rule as to coupling or uncoupling has been habitually violated with its knowledge,[5] where a violation of the rule is in effect encouraged by letting it be known that brakemen who do not couple cars promptly are likely to lose their positions,[6] where it would be impossible to do the work without violating the rule,[7] or where a reasonable necessity exists for doing the work in the manner which is in violation of the rule.[8]

(3) Riding on Cars or Locomotives

A railroad employee who is injured by reason of his disobedience of a rule of the company which forbids its employees to ride on its locomotives or on certain parts thereof, or on certain parts of its cars, is generally chargeable with such contributory negligence as will prevent a recovery.

Where the rules of a railroad company forbid its employees to ride on its locomotives or on certain parts thereof, a servant who is injured by reason of his disobedience of such rules is generally chargeable with such contributory negligence as will prevent a recovery.[9] An employee who rides on the side of a car next to an obstruction in violation of a rule forbidding it, when he might have ridden on the other side of the car where the track was free from obstructions, has been held guilty of contributory negligence.[10] Nevertheless, rules of this character may be waived or abrogated by customary violation thereof with the knowledge and assent of the company;[11] but a general custom, tolerated by an employer or consented to by its foreman, under which members of a crew rode on flat cars instead of in the dining car of a work train, is not decisive in all cases of the question whether an employee was careless in taking a position on a flat car,[12] and, moreover, a rule designated to protect the train and people on the track does not apply to accidents caused by inadequate clearance from an adjacent track.[13] Where the danger of violating the rule is so obvious and imminent that no prudent person would violate it, the fact that other employees were in the habit of violating the rule will not excuse the employee injured while violating it for so doing.[14] It has been held that an employee who is thrown from a weed-burning machine after leaving his seat thereon and going onto the platform alongside the machine to oil it while in motion violates both a rule that no repairs or adjustments may be made to a car or machine while in motion and a rule forbidding the changing of position on a car while it is in motion.[15]

(4) Boarding or Alighting from Moving Cars or Locomotives

A railroad servant injured by boarding or alighting from a moving train, car, or locomotive, in violation of a rule or order of the railroad company, generally may not recover for the injury so sustained.

A railroad servant who is injured by reason of his boarding or alighting from a moving train, car, or locomotive, in violation of a rule or order of the railroad company forbidding it, or forbidding it to be done in a certain manner, generally may not recover for the injury so sustained.[16] Such a servant, however, may not be chargeable with contributory negligence where the rule is habitually violated with the company's knowledge and assent.[17] A rule prohibiting employees from getting on or off trains while in "too rapid motion" implies that the employees may get on or off trains that are moving under conditions and circumstances that are apparently safe,[18] so that such a rule is not violated by an employee getting off a moving engine unless an ordinarily prudent man would not have done as he did.[19]

b. Mining

A miner who is injured in consequence of a violation of the rules or orders promulgated by his employer is generally chargeable with such contributory negligence as will bar a recovery.

A miner is required to exercise reasonable care in an observance of the rules promulgated by his employer,[20] and if he is injured in consequence of a violation of rules or orders he is in general, barred from a recovery for the injuries so sustained.[21] Such violation of a rule by a servant, however, will not bar a recovery for injuries sustained while so doing, where the rule has been customarily violated by other employees so as to warrant the inference that this violation was authorized and sanctioned by the employer;[22] but it must appear that the employer either had actual knowledge of its violation or by the exercise of ordinary care should have known thereof;[23] and it has been held that a customary violation of the rule to the knowledge of the company will not excuse a violation thereof by the injured servant where the act done in violation of the rule is extremely and imminently dangerous.[24]

Under some statutes a miner, workman, or other person riding on a loaded car or wagon in a mine in violation of a provision of the statute may not recover for injuries sustained thereby;[25] but this rule does not apply to an employee who, as a necessary duty, must accompany the car on its trip.[26]

c. Handling of Machinery, Tools, or Appliances

Disobedience of the rules or orders of the master as to the method of using machinery, tools, or appliances generally constitutes such contributory negligence as will bar a recovery for injuries sustained thereby.

A servant who is injured in consequence of his disobeying rules, orders, or instructions of the master as to the method of using machinery, tools, or appliances is generally chargeable with such contributory negligence as will bar a recovery,[27] especially where the danger of so doing is obvious and could easily be avoided by the servant without any instructions with reference thereto.[28] It has been held, however, that, where an employee operates a machine as it has been operated for years and as other employees operate similar machines, the employer cannot escape liability for injuries to the employee on the ground that he has violated a rule of the employment,[29] especially where it does not appear that the work could be done by any other practical method.[30]

d. Inspection or Repair

A servant who is injured as a consequence of his disobedience of a rule or order requiring him to inspect or repair is generally chargeable with such contributory negligence as will preclude a recovery.

While rules imposing the duty of inspection on servants only hold them to reasonable care in that respect,[31] where the servant is injured in consequence of his disobedience of a rule or order he generally is chargeable with such contributory negligence as will preclude a recovery.[32] This also is the rule where the servant is injured in consequence of disobedience of a rule which forbids inspection to be made in a designated way;[33] and, where a rule of the master imposes the duty of inspection on the servant, he is not excused from using reasonable care to comply with the rule although the master also has hired an inspector to examine the appliances.[34] A rule requiring inspection has no application where the servant is given neither tools nor opportunity to comply therewith.[35] A rule requiring an employee to inspect his engine before using it has no reference to defects in the mechanical construction of an engine.[36] It has been held that a failure to observe the rule requiring inspection will not bar a recovery where the rule was customarily disregarded.[37]

e. Giving of Warning or Signal by Servant Occupying Dangerous Position

A servant who disobeys a rule requiring him to give notice by warning, signal, or otherwise to the master or other servants that he has assumed, or is about to assume, a dangerous position ordinarily may not recover for injuries sustained as a consequence thereof.

As a general rule, where a servant disobeys a rule requiring him to give notice by warning, signal, or otherwise to the master or to other servants that he has assumed, or is about to assume, a dangerous position, he will not be entitled to recover for injuries sustained in consequence thereof[38] unless the master or those representing him might, by the exercise of ordinary care, have discovered his position of peril in time to avoid injuring him[39] or unless the rule has been abrogated by disuse.[40]

ing cars to put out flags or other signals in order to notify the master or other servants that the servant engaged in such work has assumed a position of danger ordinarily will prevent a recovery for injuries sustained by reason of a noncompliance with the rule.[41] It has been held, however, that for a violation of the rule to have this effect, it is necessary that the servant should have been instructed with respect thereto.[42] It has also been held that a disobedience of the rule will not prevent a recovery where the master promises to protect the servant while at work,[43] or where the rule has been abrogated by disuse[44] or waived by the railroad company.[45]

Operation of velocipede or hand car. Where a railroad employee operating a velocipede knowingly and willfully violates a rule of the company to carry lights and run against the traffic, and is injured while so doing, he cannot recover.[46] So also a servant operating a hand car, who knowingly violates a rule requiring him to keep lights on the hand car when operating it at night, and is killed by a train, his negligence will preclude a recovery[47] unless the engineer and fireman saw, or in the exercise of ordinary diligence should have seen, him in time to avoid the injury.[48] A section foreman in charge of a hand car who fails to send a flag around a curve in accordance with rules of the road is guilty of negligence which will prevent a recovery where he sustains injuries in consequence of his disobedience of the rule.[49]

Operation of trains. A conductor of a train, injured by a rear end collision through his failure to take steps to protect the rear of his train by placing torpedoes on the rail as required by rules of the company when he knew his train was being delayed and might be overtaken, is precluded by his negligence from recovery for injuries sustained.[50]

Entering mining shaft. Where a servant fails to comply with a rule forbidding anyone to come into a mining shaft without giving notice by signal, such negligence will defeat any recovery for injury received by reason of a block falling in the shaft.[51]

§ 460. Disregarding Warnings or Signals

An employee who is injured while disregarding a proper warning or signal is generally chargeable with such contributory negligence as will preclude a recovery for injuries thereby sustained.

An employee who is injured while disregarding a proper warning or signal is generally chargeable with such contributory negligence as will bar a recovery for injuries sustained in consequence thereof,[52] especially where the warning or signal has been repeatedly given.[53] His disregard of the warning or signal cannot be justified by the fact that he has been directed to hurry with his work[54] or that his mind was absorbed in his work at the time;[55] and the fact that he does not realize the magnitude of the possible injuries does not excuse him for exposing himself to the risk consequent on a disregard of such warning or signal.[56] An injured servant is not entitled to recover where he fails to call the signal to the attention of another servant on whose acts his own safety depends,[57] or where, after calling attention of the other servant to the signal and seeing that he has failed to observe it, he does nothing further,[58] nor is he entitled to recover where he disregards a warning which he himself has given to other servants;[59] and, moreover, it has been held that he may be precluded from recovering where he relies on a signal which has been improperly given.[60] It has also been held that, where the servant's disregard of the warning puts him in a place where he has no right to be and he sustains injuries at such place, he cannot recover even though the defense of contributory negligence is not available by reason of the master's willful violation of a statutory provision for the servant's safety.[61] The master, however, is not relieved from liability where the warning had no reference to the particular work at which the servant was employed when injured.[62]

Where contradictory signals are given simultaneously, thus leaving it in doubt whether the servant may proceed with safety, he is not justified in proceeding with his work and, if he does so and is injured in consequence, he cannot recover[63] unless, under the circumstances, he has a right to assume that it is safe and proper to proceed.[64]

§ 461. —— Dangerous Operations or Methods of Work

A servant who is injured while attempting dangerous operations or methods of work in disobedience of warnings or signals generally cannot recover therefor.

A servant who is injured while attempting dangerous operations or methods of work in disobedience of warnings, signals, or instructions generally cannot recover for the injuries thereby sustained,[65] as where in disregard of warnings or signals he adopts an unsafe method of performing his work with respect to the operation of a railroad,[66] such as in coupling or uncoupling cars.[67]

§ 462. —— Defective Appliances or Places of Work

A servant who is injured while working with defective or dangerous tools or appliances, or in a dangerous place, in disregard of warnings or signals, generally cannot recover for the injuries so sustained.

A servant who is working with defective or dangerous tools or appliances or in a dangerous place, and who fails to heed signals, warnings, or instructions for his safety, and is injured in consequence, is not entitled to recover.[68]

§ 463. Compliance with Commands or Orders

A servant who is injured while complying with a command or order of his master is generally not chargeable with contributory negligence.

Subject to the limitations discussed infra §§ 464–467, a servant is generally not chargeable with contributory negligence, precluding a recovery for injuries sustained, where he acts in compliance with the command or order of the master or his authorized representative,[69] even though such command or order was given negligently.[70]

§ 464. —— Where Danger Not Obvious and Imminent

A servant generally is not chargeable with contributory negligence in obeying a command or order given by the master, or by his authorized representative, if the danger to be incurred by such obedience is not so obvious and imminent that an ordinarily prudent person would refuse obedience.

Even though a servant may know that some danger is involved,[71] he is not chargeable with contributory negligence in obeying commands or orders in or about the master's business when such orders or commands are given by the master or by one in authority over the servant as a representative of the master, if the danger to be incurred by obedience thereto is not so obvious and imminent that an ordinarily prudent person would refuse obedience,[72] or, as otherwise stated, if the danger is not so obvious and imminent as to show almost inevitable injury.[73] This well-settled principle applies with full force and effect although the work might have been accomplished by a different method;[74] and especially is the rule applicable where a servant knowing, or having reason to suspect, that the work is dangerous, complains thereof, and is assured that it is safe.[75]

This general rule has been applied in cases where the servant was ordered to work with dangerous machinery, tools, or appliances,[76] or in dangerous places,[77] or to attempt dangerous operations or methods of work.[78]

An employee, leaving safe place on flat roof, where his duties required him to be, catching hold of structure, which he was assisting employer to erect on such roof to support electric sign, and pulling himself up to top of narrow wall, from which he was knocked or fell to street pavement below when structure collapsed, where he was warned by employer not to get on wall and to stay clear of structure, was chargeable with contributory negligence precluding a recovery for his death from his employer.—Brickell v. Shawn, 9 S.E.2d 330, 175 Va. 373.

Basis of rule. The considerations on which the rule is based may be briefly stated as follows: The primary duty of the servant is obedience, and he does not stand on the same footing as the master;[79] since the position of the servant is one of subordination and obedience, he has the right to rely on the superior knowledge, judgment, and skill of the master or of the superior under whom the servant is working,[80] and is not bound to set up his own judgment against that of his master or superior,[81] at the peril of being discharged,[82] even where he may question the safety of the undertaking,[83] unless his own judgment is so clearly opposed to that of the master that in fact he does not rely on his master's opinion.[84] He is not altogether free to act on his own suspicion of danger[85] but may rely on the orders of the master notwithstanding many misgivings of his own.[86] He has the right to rely on the exercise of due care on the part of the master,[87] and may assume that the master, or superior under whom the servant is working, will not direct him to do the work unless it is reasonably safe to do so or direct him to do it in a dangerous manner[88] or will not give him an order which will expose him to unusual danger not already assumed by him in his regular and normal employment.[89]

§ 465. —— Where Danger Obvious and Imminent

A servant who is injured while performing an act which he is ordered to perform, and which is so obviously and imminently dangerous that no person of ordinary prudence would obey the order, is chargeable with such contributory negligence as will bar a recovery.

A servant is not under all circumstances and at all hazards bound to obey the orders of the master.[90] He cannot shut his eyes to danger that would be apparent to a reasonably prudent person and proceed merely because directed by the master;[91] and hence where the servant knows, or by the exercise of ordinary care should know, of the peril involved in a compliance with the command or order,[92] or where the act which the servant is ordered to perform is so obviously and imminently dangerous that no person of ordinary prudence would obey the order,[93] the servant, if injured while so doing, is chargeable with such contributory negligence as will bar a recovery, even though his superior assures him of the safety of the act,[94] unless he acts under duress or coercion.[95]

Fear of discharge. According to some decisions, where the act which the servant is commanded to do is obviously and imminently dangerous, he will not be justified in obeying the command by reason of fear that disobedience of the command will result in his discharge;[96] but there is also authority to the contrary.[97]

§ 466. —— Character of Commands or Orders Servant Justified in Obeying

A command or order which should be obeyed, as affecting liability for injury while executing it, need not be given in any set words but may be inferred from any words or acts which reasonably justify such an inference.

An order to an employee, as affecting liability for his injury while executing it, need not be in set words but may be inferred from any words or acts reasonably justifying an inference of such order.[98] If, by a fair construction of an order given by a superior to a servant, a person acting with ordinary prudence and exercising ordinary care would, under the circumstances, have considered it an unequivocal specific order to do a certain thing, the master cannot escape liability for the consequences by showing that the order was open to other constructions, and was not in fact intended to be understood as the servant understood it in acting, as he supposed, in obedience thereto.[99] So an order given by a superior and transmitted by fellow servants to the servant injured is the order of the superior, and it is immaterial that the communication or the order was not direct.[1]

On the other hand, if, by the form of the order, a discretion is left with the servant as to whether he obey it or not and the servant is injured in consequence of obeying the order, he is not entitled to recover.[2] A direction to a servant to do work by a certain method when it could be done otherwise does not justify the servant in doing the work several months later by that method when under the control of a different superior who gave no such order.[3]

Authority to give orders. Ordinarily commands or orders given to a servant by one having no authority to give them furnish no protection to the servant if injured while obeying them,[4] especially where the servant in obeying the commands is acting outside the scope of his employment and is not engaged in the performance of any duty which is owing to the master,[5] and where he has received specific instructions from the master not to obey commands or orders of the character under consideration.[6]

Commands involving violation of rules or orders. Unless the danger is known and obvious,[7] a servant will not be charged with contributory negligence in obeying an authorized command of his superior even though it involves the violation of a rule or order of his master;[8] but this rule does not apply with respect to the obedience of the order of one who has no authority to give it.[9] The mere assent of a superior to the violation of a rule by another servant will not excuse the latter.[10]

Commands involving violation of statute. The fact that a servant's obedience of an authorized order involves the violation of a statute does not necessarily constitute contributory negligence.[11] It has been held, however, that a servant cannot, by disregarding the judgment of a foreman that the place in which he is working has become unsafe, and also the statute forbidding the foreman from permitting him to work there, and obeying the order of his superintendent to work in the forbidden place, render the operator liable at common law for the injuries sustained.[12]

§ 467. —— Method of Compliance; Ordinary Care

A servant must exercise ordinary care in obeying the command or order of the master, or of a superior, in order to be relieved of the charge of contributory negligence.

The fact that a servant was injured while acting in obedience to orders will not relieve him of the charge of contributory negligence, unless he exercised ordinary care for his own safety,[13] even though the command or order is accompanied by an assurance of safety,[14] especially where, in obeying the command, he was doing nothing more than a regular part of his ordinary duties and had done the particular act frequently without specific directions.[15] The servant generally will be deemed to have exercised ordinary care in acting under the express command or advice of the master, even though but for that circumstance his conduct would be considered negligent.[16]

§ 468. Acts in Emergencies

A servant who, through the negligence of the master, is suddenly placed in a position of imminent peril is generally not chargeable with such contributory negligence as will prevent a recovery for injuries sustained by reason of the fact that he adopts the more dangerous course, or that he might or would have avoided injury by pursuing another course, provided the danger is real or reasonably apparent, and the servant exercises reasonable care and diligence under the circumstances.

Servants who are placed in a position of sudden peril through the negligence of others are not expected or required to act with the same deliberation, care, and foresight as servants who have time to reflect and deliberately determine what is necessary to be done in order to protect themselves from danger;[17] and hence, where a servant without fault on his part and by reason of the master's negligence is suddenly placed in a position of peril requiring immediate action and preventing deliberation as to the proper course to pursue, the fact that he adopts the more dangerous course, or that he might or would avoid the injury by pursuing another course, will not render him guilty of such contributory negligence as will deprive him of his remedy against the master for the injuries sustained.[18] This rule applies where a servant is confronted with a sudden emergency in the course of his work in the operation of a railroad or of its locomotives or cars,[19] such as in coupling or uncoupling cars[20] or in going between the cars for such purpose.[21]

However, while there are some decisions apparently to the contrary,[22] it has generally been held that, even where an emergency of this character exists, the servant, in order to be free from the charge of contributory negligence, must exercise as much care and diligence in preserving himself from injury as would be exercised under the same or similar circumstances by an ordinarily prudent and careful man,[23] but this is the limit of care which can be required of the servant.[24] The law does not require of him infallible judgment[25] or that he shall act on the wisest course to escape the threatened danger;[26] nor is he required to exercise the same amount of care as an ordinarily prudent and careful man would exercise under ordinary circumstances.[27]

Necessity for real or apparent danger. In order to bring a case within the rule exempting the servant from contributory negligence for acts done in an emergency caused by the master's negligence, the acts must be done under a sense of impending danger,[28] and the danger must be a real one,[29] or the circumstances must be such as to create in the mind of the servant a reasonable apprehension of danger.[30]

Emergency created by servant. If the emergency in which the servant acts is of his own making, the master cannot be held liable on the theory that it had by its negligence placed him in such a position as to relieve the servant of the duty of exercising ordinary care for his own safety.[31] The rule presupposes that the party who invokes it is himself

A locomotive fireman, confronted with necessity of choosing instantly between remaining at his post and being scalded by steam from burst locomotive boiler or jumping from engine cab while train was running relatively slow, was not guilty of contributory negligence, barring recovery from railroad company for his death, in jumping, instead of remaining in cab as hindsight showed would have been safer course.—Louisville & N. free from fault in creating the emergency.[32]

Concurrent negligence of master and servant. If the servant's negligence combines with that of the master in putting the servant in the place of peril, and he is injured, he cannot recover.[33]

Repetition of previous occurrence. A servant cannot rely on the exception of sudden peril as excusing his failure to exercise ordinary care where the occurrence which alarmed him was a repetition of that which he had theretofore observed and should have anticipated.[34]

Act done in furtherance of work. If the act which caused the injury was not done for the purpose of saving the servant from injury, but merely in furtherance of his work, he cannot claim absence of contributory negligence on the ground that he made a mistake of judgment.[35]

Obeying orders in an emergency is not, in general, contributory negligence which will bar a recovery, although it is apparent that to do so is attended with danger.[36]

§ 469. —— Effort to Save Life or Prevent Injury to Others

Contributory negligence ordinarily will not be imputed to a servant who, while acting within the scope of his duties, attempts, in the face of imminent danger, to protect others from death or personal injury.

As a general rule contributory negligence will not be imputed to a servant who, while acting within the scope of his duties, attempts, in the face of imminent danger, to protect others from death or personal injury.[37] The law has so great a regard for human life that it will not impute negligence to an effort to preserve it, unless made under such circumstances as to constitute rashness in the judgment of prudent persons;[38] all that is required of the servant is that he should act with such care as might be expected of a person of ordinary prudence under similar circumstances,[39] but at least this degree of care is required of him.[40] He is not charged with the consequences of error in judgment resulting from the excitement and confusion of the moment.[41]

If the master was not negligent, the fact that the servant sustained injuries or was killed while attempting to save human life under circumstances of imminent danger will not authorize a recovery.[42]

§ 470. —— Effort to Save Master's Property

One who, in the exercise of reasonable care and prudence, makes an attempt to save the master's property in an emergency and is injured while so doing is generally not chargeable with contributory negligence.

One who, in the exercise of reasonable care and prudence, makes an attempt to save the master's property in an emergency and is injured while so doing is generally not chargeable with contributory negligence.[43] Nevertheless, the mere fact that a servant attempts to save the master's property in an emergency does not necessarily secure him immunity from the charge of contributory negligence.[44] The question in every case of this character is whether the acts of the servant measure up to the standard of ordinary care and prudence.[45]

Remaining on track to extricate car
A signalman who was killed when train collided with inspection car which signalman was attempting to remove from track was not required to remain on track merely to prevent damage to car.—Deere v. South-

A mere error of judgment will not charge the servant with contributory negligence or preclude a recovery for injuries sustained while acting in an emergency to save the property of the master;[46] and it has been held that the fact that an employee's acts, in connection with others, occasioned threatened dangers to the employer's property does not preclude a recovery for death caused by his attempt to ward off the danger, where his acts were not culpable.[47] In some states it has been held that the "imminent peril doctrine" does not protect a servant where mere property damage resulting from the master's negligence is involved.[48]

Compliance with orders. If an employer calls on an employee suddenly to extricate his property from peril under circumstances allowing no time for consideration, and the employee acting in compliance with the positive orders is injured, he may recover for such injuries received because of the emergency[49] unless the act to be done is obviously so dangerous that a man of ordinary prudence would not have obeyed the order.[50] This rule applies only where there is imminent danger or hazard to the master's property.[51]

3. Inexperienced or Youthful Servants

The youth or inexperience of a servant does not of itself relieve him from the effects of contributory negligence; he is bound to exercise such care and prudence as may reasonably be expected of a person of his age, capacity, and experience in the same circumstances.

Except in so far as controlled by statute, as discussed infra § 480, the youth or inexperience of a servant does not of itself relieve him from the effect of contributory negligence.[52] Nevertheless, his age, intelligence, physical attainments, and experience are matters which may and should be considered in determining his contributory negligence;[53] and he is only bound to exercise such care and prudence as may reasonably be expected of a person of his age, capacity, and experience in the same circumstances,[54] and not as high a degree of care as would ordinarily be required of a prudent person of maturity and experience.[55] He is, however, required to exercise such a degree of care as may be expected from a person of his age, knowledge, experience, and capacity;[56] and notwithstanding his minority, if he has sufficient intelligence to appreciate the danger of a situation, the rules applicable to adults, discussed supra § 427, et seq, may be applied in his case.[57]

§ 472. Representation as to Age and Experience

A servant who misrepresents or conceals the facts as to his age or experience generally may not recover for injuries caused by his negligence or inexperience.

A minor servant who misrepresents or conceals the facts as to his age generally may not recover for injuries caused by his negligence.[58] So also an inexperienced person who has obtained employment by pretending to an experience which he has not had cannot recover for an injury caused by his inexperience;[59] and this has also been held to be true although the servant made known the fact that he was wholly inexperienced in the occupation which he solicited.[60] However, a representation as to experience will not impute to the servant knowledge of dangers arising from the gross negligence of the master, but only those incident to the work when conducted with ordinary care and prudence.[61]

§ 473. Scope of Employment

A minor or inexperienced servant who voluntarily places himself in a position of danger, outside the scope of his employment, is chargeable with contributory negligence.

Where a minor or inexperienced servant voluntarily places himself in a position of danger, not called for by the nature of his employment, he is guilty of contributory negligence barring recovery for injuries received by him.[62]

§ 474. Knowledge of Danger

A young and inexperienced servant who is aware of the danger involved may be chargeable with such contributory negligence as will preclude a recovery for injuries sustained.

If a young and inexperienced servant is aware of the danger, his negligence will defeat recovery for an injury to which it directly contributed,[63] especially where the act resulting in the injury is in direct disobedience of orders.[64] However, in order to charge a minor or inexperienced adult with contributory negligence, he must have actual or constructive knowledge of the danger, and not merely of the defects which cause it.[65] A fortiori, an inexperienced servant is not chargeable with contributory negligence where he has no knowledge of the defects or danger,[66] especially where he is assured by the master or a superior servant that there is no danger.[67]

§ 475. Duty to Discover or Remedy Defects

A young or inexperienced servant is generally not chargeable with contributory negligence in failing to discover latent defects or dangers; and where he is placed at work in a dangerous situation, without being given due caution and instruction, the fact that the danger might have been discovered is not in itself sufficient to charge him with contributory negligence.

An inexperienced servant is not chargeable with contributory negligence in failing to make examination for latent defects or dangers,[68] especially where he is acting under orders of the master.[69] Where a master places a young or inexperienced person at work in an exposed and dangerous situation, he is bound to give him due caution and instruction, and if he fails to do so the fact that the servant might have seen the danger is not in itself sufficient to charge him with contributory negligence,[70] and he should not be charged with such negligence if he exercises reasonable care as far as the facts appear to him.[71] So also if an employer, without giving due caution and instructions, places a young and inexperienced servant at work, the dangers and risks of which the servant does not appreciate, and the servant is injured because of the dangers of the work, the employer is liable although the servant may not be free entirely from fault at the time of the injury,[72] especially where he does as others have been accustomed to do, with the master's knowledge.[73]

A servant of sufficient age and experience to appreciate the risks of his work cannot recover for injuries caused by his failure to take due precautions against known or obvious dangers.

A servant of such age and experience as to be capable of exercising discretion, and of appreciating the risks of the work in which he is engaged, cannot recover for injuries caused by his inattention to his surroundings, and failure to take due precautions against known or obvious dangers,[74] especially where the employee having knowledge of the danger puts himself in a position not required by his duties.[75]

§ 477. Disobedience of Rules or Orders

A youthful or inexperienced servant who acts in disobedience of orders, rules, or warnings is generally chargeable with contributory negligence.

As a general rule, where a youthful servant is injured while acting in disobedience of orders, rules, or warnings, he is chargeable with such contributory negligence as will bar a recovery[76] unless the order or rule has been habitually disobeyed, and the work cannot well be done without disregarding it.[77]

§ 478. Compliance with Commands or Orders

A young or inexperienced servant who undertakes dangerous work in obedience to the command or order of the master or his authorized agent is not chargeable with contributory negligence unless the danger is obvious.

Where a young or inexperienced servant undertakes dangerous work in obedience to the command or order of the master or his authorized agent he is not chargeable with contributory negligence[78] unless the danger is so manifest and glaring that it must be known to one of his age and experience that he cannot do it without injury;[79] and this rule applies although the order given is in violation of a rule of the master.[80]

§ 479. Acts in Emergencies

A young and inexperienced servant is not chargeable with contributory negligence by reason of the fact that in an emergency, caused by his master's negligence, he does an act which contributes to his injury.

Where a young and inexperienced servant is injured while acting in an emergency caused by the master's negligence, he may recover, although, in the excitement of the moment, he loses his presence of mind and does an act which contributes to his injury.[81]

§ 480. Violation of Statutes for Protection of Minors

a. By master
b. By servant

a. By Master

Under some statutes the defense of contributory negligence is not available to the master where the injured minor was employed in violation of a statute enacted for his protection, as where at the time of his employment he was under a designated age or was employed without a required certificate of his age or capacity.

Under some statutes the defense of contributory negligence is not available where a minor is employed in violation of any law of the state or of the United States[82] unless there was fraud or misrep-

Hiring under prohibited age. Under statutes which forbid the employment of minors under a designated age and make disobedience thereof an offense, discussed generally in Infants § 12, where a minor hired in violation of such statute is injured in the service the defense of contributory negligence is generally not available to the employer.[84] It is immaterial that, at the time of the injury, the child was acting outside the scope of his employment and was doing work he was not authorized to perform[85] or which he had in fact been forbidden to do.[86] The construction placed on these statutes makes the employer an insurer of the safety of the child.[87] However, there is authority to the effect that such a statute has no application where a servant employed in violation of its provisions was at the time of the injury of such age that he might be employed without violating the statute[88] or that, where the statute specifies certain employments in which the minor may not be employed, contributory negligence may be available as a defense where he is injured in an employment not so specified.[89]

In some states statutes making it an offense to employ minors under a designated age do not abrogate the defense of contributory negligence or affect it in any way[90] unless the contributory negligence is of the kind that must reasonably be anticipated as a probable consequence of the violation of the statute.[91] It has been held, in order for contributory negligence to be a defense, that the minor must not only have the capacity to understand and appreciate his instructions and warnings against the dangers incident to his unlawful employment but he must in fact understand them, and his negligent act must not be such as the statute was intended to provide against,[92] and furthermore the minor must possess such unusual intelligence as to take him out of the class which the statute was intended to protect.[93]

Employment without required certificate. It has been held that noncompliance of the master with a statute forbidding the employment of a minor without obtaining a certificate of his age or capacity precludes the defense of contributory negligence;[94] but there is also authority to the contrary.[95]

b. By Servant

A violation by a minor servant of a statute intended for his protection constitutes contributory negligence which will bar a recovery.[96]

§ 481. Violation of Agreement with Parent

The fact that the master, in violation of an agreement with the minor employee's father, assigns the minor dangerous work does not estop the master to set up contributory negligence of the minor.

The fact that, after the father of a minor consents to his employment on the understanding that

Generally, while an employer may discharge an at-will employee for a good reason, a bad reason, or no reason at all,[15.5] the mere fact that an employment contract is terminable at will does not give an employer the absolute or unfettered right to discharge an at will employee in all cases,[15.10] but the right to discharge such an employee may be limited by considerations of public policy.[15.15] Stated differently, an employer's right to discharge an employee at will carries a correlative duty not to discharge an employee who declines to perform an act that would require a violation of a clear mandate of public policy.[15.20] The sources of public policy include legislation;[15.25] administrative rules, regulations, or decisions;[15.30] and judicial decisions.[15.35] However, even when an important public policy is involved an employer may discharge an at-will employee if he has a separate, plausible and legitimate reason for doing so.[15.40]
